Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Rally in Alexandria, VA 10/29/08

Hello All,
Unfortunately we weren't able to send a tracker to this event. But good news: we were able to capture the event via online-streaming video. Below are the notes from that effort.

Big Highlights

- Gives President credit for not being attacked since 9/11
- Says Hugo Chavez hurt his feelings. [sarcasm] Would like to sit down with him with release of political prisoners, free elections, and there are functioning human rights organizations
- Brings up drilling in Florida, says revenues should go to Tallahassee rather than Washington.
- Repeats Obama's television appearance as an "infomercial" interrupting the World Series

Arlington, VA: McCain Rally 10/29/08

(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Speech Highlights

(Introduces Charlie Crist, Senator Mel Martinez, Joe Lieberman, Tom Ridge, Lindsey Graham)

It's great to be back in Florida. We need to win Florida on November 4th, and with your help -- we're going to win here, and bring real change to Washington. We need a new direction, and we have to fight for it.

My friends, you hear a lot of things, but you know, it's no accident that the United States of America has not been attacked since 9/11. I do believe that the President of the United States deserves some credit for that, don't you?

I've been fighting for this country since I was seventeen years old, and I have the scars to prove it. If I'm elected President, I will fight to shake up Washington and take America in a new direction from my first day in office until my last. I'm not afraid of the fight, I'm ready for it.

I have a plan to hold the line on taxes and cut them to make America more competitive and create jobs here at home. We're going to double the child deduction for working families. We will cut the capital gains tax. And we will cut business taxes to help create jobs, and keep American businesses in America. Raising taxes makes a bad economy much worse. Keeping taxes low creates jobs, keeps money in your hands and strengthens our economy.

If I'm elected President, I won't spend nearly a trillion dollars more of your money. Senator Obama will. And he can't do that without raising your taxes or digging us further into debt. I'm going to make government live on a budget just like you do.

I will freeze government spending on all but the most important programs like defense, veterans care, NASA, Social Security and health care until we scrub every single government program and get rid of the ones that aren't working for the American people. And I will veto every single pork barrel bill Congresses passes.

I'm not going to spend $750 billion dollars of your money just bailing out the Wall Street bankers and brokers who got us into this mess. Senator Obama will. I'm going to make sure we take care of the working people who were devastated by the excesses of Wall Street and Washington.

I have a plan to fix our housing market, so that your home value doesn't go down when your neighbor defaults, and so that people in danger of defaulting have a path to pay off their loan.

Including Hugo Chavez in Venezuela. By the way, I heard that Fidel Castro wrote some sentiments about me the other day. And let me just say, it hurt my feelings. And I want to tell you, I'll sit down with one of the Castro brothers right after the empty the political prisons, right after they have free elections, right after the human rights organizations are functioning. You saw the other day about what the Castro Brothers are about. When Cuba was hit with a natural disaster and they refused American humanitarian aid. That's what they're all about, my friends. And have no illusions.

If I'm elected President, we're going to stop spending $700 billion to buy oil from countries that don't like us very much.

My friends, with more money and more revenues to the state of Florida, we will drill offshore and drill now. With the agreement of the state of Florida. And my friends, I've already talked to your state's great Governor, we're going to drill off the shores of Florid a, then we need to give Florida more of those revenues. They shouldn't be sent to Washington, they should be sent to Tallahasee.

Senator Obama will argue to delay drilling for more oil and gas and against building new nuclear power plants in America. If I am president, we will start new drilling now.

We will invest in all energy alternatives -- nuclear, wind, solar, and tide. We will encourage the manufacture of hybrid, flex fuel and electric automobiles. We will invest in clean coal technology. We will lower the cost of energy within months, and we will create millions of new jobs.

We've learned more about Senator Obama's real goals for our country over the last two weeks than we learned over the past two years, and that only because Joe the plumber asked him a question in Ohio. That's when Senator Obama revealed he wants to quote "spread the wealth around."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Now, Joe didn't ask for Senator Obama to come to his house, and he didn't ask to be famous. He certainly didn't ask for the political attacks on him from the Obama campaign. Joe's dream is to own a small business that will create jobs, and the attacks on him are an attack on small businesses all over the country. These are people like Gus the homebuilder and Peter the exterminator right here in Miami. Small businesses employ 84 percent of Americans, and we need to support these small businesses, not tax them.

After months of campaign trail eloquence, we've finally learned what Senator Obama's economic goal is: to spread the wealth. In a radio interview revealed this week, he said the same thing -- that one of the quote, "tragedies" of the civil rights movement is that it didn't bring about "redistributive change."

You see, Senator Obama believes in redistributing wealth, not in policies that grow our economy and create jobs. He said that even though lower taxes on investment help our economy, he favors higher taxes on investment for quote "fairness." There's nothing "fair" about driving our economy into the ground. We all suffer when that happens, and that is the problem with Senator Obama's approach to our economy. He is more interested in controlling wealth than in creating it, in redistributing money instead of spreading opportunity. I am going to create wealth for all Americans, by creating opportunity for all Americans.

Senator Obama is running to be Redistributionist in Chief. I'm running to be Commander in Chief. Senator Obama is running to spread the wealth. I'm running to create more wealth. Senator Obama is running to punish the successful. I'm running to make everyone successful.

Senator Obama has made a lot of promises. First he said people making less than 250,000 dollars would benefit from his plan, then this weekend he announced in an ad that if you're a family making less than 200,000 dollars you'll benefit -- but this week, Senator Biden said tax relief should only go to "middle class people -- people making under 150,000 dollars a year." It's interesting how their definition of rich has a way of creeping down. At this rate, it won't be long before Senator Obama is right back to his vote that Americans making just 42,000 dollars a year should get a tax increase. We can't let that happen.

This Democratic Congress is planning all sorts of new taxes. This week, we are hearing they want to tax your 401k contributions. This is a time when we need to be encouraging more investing, not taxing it. We can't let them get away with making a bad economy even worse. Now is the time to grow our economy, and that's what I'm going to do.

My opponent's massive new tax increase is exactly the wrong approach in an economic slowdown. The answer to a slowing economy is not higher taxes, but that is exactly what is going to happen when the Democrats have total control of Washington. We can't let that happen. We need pro-growth and pro-jobs economic policies, not pro-government spending programs paid for with higher taxes.

This is the fundamental difference between Senator Obama and me. He thinks taxes are too low, and I think that spending is too high.

If we are going to change Washington, we need a President who has actually fought for change and made it happen. The next President won't have time to get used to the office. We face many challenges here at home, and many enemies abroad in this dangerous world.

Senator Biden warned that Senator Obama would be tested with an international crisis. I have been tested. Senator Obama hasn't. Senator Biden referred to how Jack Kennedy was tested in the Cuban Missile Crisis and I have a little personal experience in that. I was on board the U.S.S. Enterprise, and I sat in a jet cockpit on the flight deck waiting to take off. We had a target. I know how close we came to a nuclear war and I will not be a president that needs to be tested.

We know Senator Obama won't have the right response to that test, because we've seen the wrong response from him over and over during this campaign. He opposed the surge strategy that is bringing us victory in Iraq and will bring us victory in Afghanistan. He said he would sit down unconditionally with the world's worst dictators. When Russia invaded Georgia, Sen. Obama said the invaded country should show restraint. He's been wrong on all of these. When I am president, we are going to win in Iraq and win in Afghanistan, and our troops will come home in victory and honor.

Let me give you the state of the race today. There's less than a week to go. We're a few points down. The pundits have written us off, just like they've done before. My opponent is working out the details with Speaker Pelosi and Senator Reid of their plans to raise your taxes, increase spending, and concede defeat in Iraq. He's measuring the drapes, and he's planned his first address to the nation for before the election. I guess I'm old fashioned about these things -- I prefer to let the voters weigh in before presuming the outcome.

What America needs now is someone who will finish the race before the starting the victory lap, someone who will fight to the end, and not for himself but for his country.

I have fought for you most of my life, and in places where defeat meant more than returning to the Senate. There are other ways to love this country, but I've never been the kind to back down when the stakes are high.

I know you're worried. America is a great country, but we are at a moment of national crisis that will determine our future.

Will we continue to lead the world's economies or will we be overtaken? Will the world become safer or more dangerous? Will our military remain the strongest in the world? Will our children and grandchildren's future be brighter than ours?

My answer to you is yes. Yes, we will lead. Yes, we will prosper. Yes, we will be safer. Yes, we will pass on to our children a stronger, better country. But we must be prepared to act swiftly, boldly, with courage and wisdom.

I'm an American. And I choose to fight. Don't give up hope. Be strong. Have courage. And fight. Fight for a new direction for our country. Fight for what's right for America.

Fight to clean up the mess of corruption, infighting and selfishness in Washington.

Fight to get our economy out of the ditch and back in the lead.

Fight for the ideals and character of a free people.

Fight for our children's future.

Fight for justice and opportunity for all.

Stand up to defend our country from its enemies.

Stand up, stand up, stand up and fight. America is worth fighting for. Nothing is inevitable here. We never give up. We never quit. We never hide from history. We make history. Now, let's go win this election and get this country moving again.

Clinton Seen Launching 2016 Bid in April (The Wall Street Journal)
By Peter Nicholas and Carol E. Lee
March 2, 2015
The Wall Street Journal

Hillary Clinton and her close advisers are telling Democratic donors she will enter the presidential race sooner than expected, likely in April, a move that would allay uncertainties within her party and allow her to rev up fundraising.

Clinton aides have spoken of the earlier timetable in private meetings, according to people engaged in recent discussions about the presumed Democratic front-runner's emerging 2016 campaign. Many within her camp have advocated her staying out of the fray until the summer.

Jumping in sooner would help the Democratic field take shape, reassuring party leaders and donors that the former first lady, senator and secretary of state is running. A super PAC loyal to Mrs. Clinton has faced hesitation from donors who don't want to make big pledges until she is a candidate. Such concerns would evaporate after she announces.

But Mrs. Clinton would become an even larger target for Republicans when she enters the race. She also would be pressed to opine on a raft of thorny issues in the news, including how to combat the military advances of Islamic State militants in the Middle East.

One influential proponent of an earlier announcement is John Podesta, who is expected to play an important role in Mrs. Clinton's presidential campaign, one person familiar with the matter said. Mr. Podesta, who in January resigned as senior adviser in the Obama White House, declined to comment, as did a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton.

Many Democratic activists say they would like to see the race begin in earnest -- something that won't happen until Mrs. Clinton jumps in.

Mrs. Clinton "should get in right now. If she's going to run, get a campaign going," said Jason Frerichs, a county Democratic chairman in Iowa, the state that holds the first contest of the 2016 campaign.

Mrs. Clinton, according to some close associates, doesn't relish the campaign trail and is in no particular hurry to announce, especially given the scant competition for her party's nomination. Most polls show Mrs. Clinton running far ahead of her nearest potential challenger, Vice President Joe Biden.

"She's obviously biding her time before she gets out there," said Delaware Gov. Jack Markell, a Democrat.

Mrs. Clinton, 67 years old, made known her feelings about grueling campaigns in a private meeting last month with London Mayor Boris Johnson. Mr. Johnson later said she had bemoaned the lengthy U.S. presidential campaigns.

During her 2008 bid, she teared up at a campaign event in New Hampshire when describing the rigors of campaign life: lack of sleep, an overreliance on pizza and limited ability to exercise.

"If I were taking this on, seeing what candidates went through last time around, I'd sure want to put it off as long as I could," said Doug Goldman, a major fundraiser for President Barack Obama who lives in San Francisco. At this point in the 2008 cycle, Mrs. Clinton already was a candidate.

Mrs. Clinton's team has considered first forming an exploratory committee, a common in-between step candidates use to signal they are running while avoiding the formal launch of a campaign. But her camp now appears likely to scrap that idea.

A later entrance into the race comes with certain perils. She hopes to raise more than $1 billion for the campaign, people familiar with her plans said, and some Democratic donors are concerned that if she waits until the summer, she would be hard-pressed to meet that goal.

With no apparatus in place, Mrs. Clinton also has a limited capability to rapidly respond to potential threats to a campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans and even some Democrats have questioned the foreign contributions collected by her family's charitable foundation, as recounted in a spate of recent news stories.

As yet, the response from the Clinton side mostly has come in the form of prepared statements from the Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation.

Behind the scenes, the Clinton team is busy preparing for the race. Mrs. Clinton has been meeting with numerous policy experts as she crafts a message and platform. Close adviser Huma Abedin has been holding private meetings with supporters the campaign would call on for help after it is under way.

Election 2016: Hillary Clinton Reported Ready To Announce Candidacy Next Month (International Business Times)

By Marcy Kreiter
March 1, 2015
International Business Times

Hillary Clinton reportedly plans to announce her candidacy for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination in April. The Wall Street Journal reported Sunday Clinton and her close advisers decided on the move to allay uncertainties and boost fundraising.

News of the pending announcement comes as stories surfaced about money the Clinton Foundation has accepted from foreign and corporate donors while she was secretary of state. The reports threaten to complicate Clinton's presumed plan to focus on her foreign policy credentials in any campaign.

Clinton had been expected to put off an announcement until summer, but donors had been holding back, thwarting fundraising efforts. A source told the Journal John Podesta played a big role in the decision. She is expected to skip the step of forming an exploratory committee.

Money appears to be the issue. Clinton is expected to raise more than $1 billion for her campaign, topping the $716 million the Center for Responsive Politics said was collected by President Obama in 2012.

Clinton, who is considered the frontrunner and faces little competition, had been reluctant to enter the fray so soon. Polls have shown her far ahead of her nearest rival, Vice President Joe Biden.

Clinton has been working with policy experts to craft a message and platform, and close adviser Huma Abedin has been meeting with supporters.

The Washington Post reported last week that during Clinton's tenure as secretary of state, the Clinton Foundation raked in millions of dollars from seven foreign governments, including one donation for earthquake relief in Haiti from Algeria that should have been cleared by the State Department first. The donation coincided with an Algerian effort to lobby the United States on human rights issues.

Other questionable monies came from Kuwait, Qatar, Oman, Australia, Norway and the Dominican Republic.

The foundation, which has raised nearly $2 billion since its inception in 2001, defended some of the gifts as multiyear grants that were awarded before Hillary Clinton joined the Obama administration. The Post also reported foreign donations made up made up a third of gifts exceeding $1 million over time.

Jerry Brown's popularity as governor doesn't extend to a presidential race (LA Times)
By Cathleen Decker
March 1, 2015
LA Times

Katherine Martinez is a Democrat from San Andreas, fiercely supportive of her state's — and party's — governor.

"I have definitely followed him and definitely voted for him," she said of Jerry Brown, and she has pushed back on anyone who had "the nerve" to criticize him.

But vote for him for president against that far-more-probable candidate, Hillary Rodham Clinton?

"Oh, man," she said, and then grappled with why. "You know, Hillary has got the international experience Jerry Brown has not — and only on that reason I would go with Hillary. I love both of you."

She is not alone. In a new USC Dornsife-Los Angeles Times poll, Brown has zoomed in popularity. He is now the most popular politician on the state stage. Almost two-thirds of voters — a cosmically high proportion — approve of how he's doing his job. Almost six in 10 Californians have a positive view of him.

And Hillary Clinton would clock him in his home state were the two to meet in a run for the presidency.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Not that that is actually going to happen. Clinton keeps insisting that she's marking off the pros and cons of a run, all the while building a campaign organization that will be ready from Day One to clobber a few competing Democrats no one has ever heard of.

People have heard of Brown, but his campaign calculus is different. He has toyed a bit with the idea of running a fourth time for president but has bowed to reality. He's 76 years old, closing in on 77 in April, meaning that he would be 78 on election day were he to thwart sanity and run. He's a sitting governor in a state that is ungovernable from afar.

But, oh, how the wayback machine would spurt to life if a presidential campaign pitted Brown against a Clinton. Brown is, after all, the presidential candidate who, in 1992, called Bill Clinton a "hypocrite" and the "prince of sleaze" and "a fraud" and predicted that he'd "destroy the Democratic Party."

Brown is the candidate who, that same year, took part in a debate with Clinton that resembled a roller-derby rumble, each man ending up figuratively bloodied and unkempt. It was that debate, in Chicago, in which Brown took on Hillary Clinton's financial and legal dealings in Arkansas.

"Let me tell you something, Jerry," Clinton said in one finger-shaking exchange. "I don't care what you say about me.... But you ought to be ashamed of yourself for jumping on my wife."

Small historical note: That exchange led Hillary Clinton to defend her career in words that, while heartfelt, gave heartburn to campaign staff members who had to explain that she hadn't meant to slight stay-at-home mothers: "I suppose I could have stayed home and baked cookies and had teas, but what I decided to do is fulfill my profession."

By the end of that campaign, feelings were so raw that Brown didn't do Clinton the traditional grudging courtesy of endorsing him.

The follies continued in 2010, when Brown was running for governor against the moneyed Republican Meg Whitman. Whitman aired an ad reprising Bill Clinton's 1992 criticism of Brown, prompting Brown to defend himself in a rather unseemly way — by raising the specter of Clinton's affair with Monica Lewinsky.

"I mean Clinton's a nice guy, but who ever said he always told the truth?" Brown said during an East Los Angeles appearance. "You remember, right? There's that whole story there about did he or didn't he. OK.... I did not have taxes with this state." (The latter a not-very-transparent reference to Clinton's assertion that he "did not have sexual relations with that woman.")

But politics is a transactional business, and arguably the best politicians are the most transactional. Clinton endorsed Brown two days later and campaigned for him as well.

The theory has held that Brown, however tempted, would not run for president again because of the afore-mentioned complications. The poll, conducted for the USC Dornsife College of Letters Arts and Sciences and The Times, demonstrated another reality: Even in Brown's home state, there's really no demand for him.

Overall, California voters sided with Hillary Clinton over Brown 49% to 26%, and 20% sided with neither. Among Democrats, it was even worse for Brown: 61% for Clinton to 25% for him. Among the Democratic Party's key voter groups, just as bad: Latinos went for Clinton 57% to 26%; women went for her 54% to 22%; and liberals sided with her 66% to 23%.

This is how locked-in Clinton's vote was: Even among those who said they have a favorable view of Brown and approve of the way he's done his job, he couldn't exceed 30%.

Brown's closest showing was among Republicans, who went for Clinton 29% to 26% (with a hefty 42% saying neither one, thank you.)

Dan Schnur, director of USC's Jesse M. Unruh Institute of Politics, said it made sense for Brown to be doing well in California — but falling hard before Clinton in a mock presidential run.

"Voters like them for very different reasons and very different roles," he said. "She is a trailblazer. He is adult supervision. She says, 'Let's shatter the glass ceiling.' He says, 'Get off my lawn.' "

Regular voters are not quite that caustic. Chuck Todd, like Katherine Martinez a poll respondent, said that he sided with Clinton not because he dislikes Brown — in fact, he thinks Brown "has done a really good job here" — but because of what Clinton would bring to a campaign.

"I think she's got an awareness of international concerns," said Todd, a freelance infographics artist from Concord (and not the identically named "Meet the Press" host). "I think she's going to be a strong leader because of her background."

Emily's List is Ready for Hillary (Bloomberg)
By Jennifer Epstein
March 2, 2015
Bloomberg

Emily's List hasn't yet endorsed Hillary Clinton in the 2016 presidential race, but that's just a formality. The PAC, founded in 1985, has helped Democratic women reach every level of elected office short of the White House. Now the group is focusing its resources on the one goal that has eluded it.

Since soon after President Barack Obama won a second term, Emily's List has been preparing for Clinton to run, convening conversations about electing a woman president, and commissioning polling on Americans' views. But the groundwork goes back even further, to the group's founding three decades ago to support Democratic women running for Senate and to the years it's spent advocating for women in politics.

On Tuesday, Clinton will return the favor, delivering the keynote speech at the group's 30th anniversary gala in Washington as she prepares to embark on what people close to her are not shying away from calling an historic campaign. Bookending the significance of her second shot at the presidency, she'll be introduced by Maryland Senator Barbara Mikulski, the first woman elected to the Senate in her own right, in 1986.

"She has a message and we have a mission that are both clearly attuned to what this country seems to be needing right now: more women's voices speaking for women and families," said Emily's List communications director Jess McIntosh. "Not on behalf of special interests. Not the ego-driven Washington dysfunction that we've seen."

Back in early 2013, when Clinton's 2016 campaign seemed not as certain as it does in March 2015, Emily's List launched its Madam President initiative with the goal of supporting a Democratic woman in the 2016 race. While the group mentioned then-Homeland Security Secretary Janet Napolitano and Senator Kirsten Gillibrand as possible candidates, Clinton was the top target.

"Let's be clear: they did that for Hillary," said Democratic strategist Maria Cardona, a senior adviser to Clinton's 2008 campaign.

Emily's List president Stephanie Schriock almost said as much. "I have to say there is one name that seems to be getting mentioned more than others," she told reporters nearly two years ago at the launch of Madam President. "We do not know if Hillary is going to run, but we are hopeful that she may."

Emily's List commissioned polling—conducted by one of the firms that has since signed on to work for Clinton—to make its point, finding that 86 percent of voters in nine battleground states said they believed the United States was ready to elect a woman president, while 72 percent said it was likely that a woman would be elected in 2016. Other polls have found the support to be not quite as strong—especially among Republicans, as it's become clear that Clinton is the woman most likely to get to the presidency first—but there's nonetheless evidence that public opinion has become more supportive of electing a woman just since Clinton's first attempt in 2008.

Emily's List is by no means a newcomer to the Hillary Clinton bandwagon.

Clinton drew 1,000 women to the Washington Hilton—the same place where she'll speak Tuesday—in the spring of 1996 for what the New York Times described as an Emily's List-organized "pep rally to bolster her spirits" amid the strains of the Whitewater scandal.

It endorsed Clinton's first presidential bid on the same day that she announced the creation of an exploratory committee and backed Clinton in her 2000 Senate campaign. "And our members were fans of hers long before that," McIntosh said.

The group's staff is also deeply entangled with Clinton.

Schriock was often discussed as a possible campaign manager before Clinton decided to go with Robby Mook. Instead, she'll stay at Emily's List and manage the group's interactions with the campaign, a role clarified last week when she left the board of Priorities USA, the super-PAC that aims to be the largest outside group supporting Clinton. Denise Feriozzi, who is heading up independent expenditures as Emily's List's political director, will take Schriock's place on the board.

While Feriozzi won't be directly working with the Clinton team to avoid running afoul of campaign-finance laws, she has deep connections in the Clinton network and is steeped in its values, since she worked for the 2008 campaign in Iowa, Nevada, Ohio, and Wisconsin. Executive director Jess O'Connell knows Hillaryland well, too—she was national director of operations for Clinton in 2007 and 2008.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Emily's List founder Ellen Malcolm was a national co-chair of Clinton's 2008 campaign and hasn't shied away from supporting the 2016 bid, throwing her support behind Ready for Hillary two years ago. "I've seen—we've all seen—how smart, tough, resilient and caring Hillary is. I've been ready for Hillary to be president for decades," she said then.

There are no official ties between Emily's List and Ready for Hillary, but the two organizations have, along with American Bridge and Priorities USA, made up much of the organized effort to prepare for Clinton to run. Ready for Hillary will dissolve once Clinton announces her candidacy and, at that point, much of the organization will be absorbed within Emily's List.

"We want to make sure the assets built by Hillary's supporters, such as a robust social media presence, are not lost when Ready for Hillary shuts down," spokesman Seth Bringman said. The group plans to cease operations as soon as Clinton enters the race.

While a decision hasn't been finalized, the group is considering transferring its social media accounts—including a Facebook page with almost 2.2 million likes and a Twitter account with 143,000 followers—to Emily's List. It also aims to go through the complex legal process of transferring its e-mail list of more than 3 million to the official Clinton apparatus.

"Emily's List shares our grassroots approach and our goal of making history in 2016, so transferring our social media accounts to them would make perfect sense," Bringman said.

In the meantime, Ready for Hillary is continuing to organize and fundraise, in part by seizing on Clinton's speech to Emily's List. It's bought tables at Tuesday night's gala and has asked members to organize house parties to watch the speech. The group is also hosting a pre-speech call featuring former Michigan Governor Jennifer Granholm, the co-chair of Priorities USA.

This time, Hillary will run as a woman (CNN)
By Donna Brazile

CNN

After spending much of her 2008 campaign seemingly running away from the fact that she is a woman, Hillary Clinton is showing signs that 2016 is going to be a different story.

It seems that Hillary has found her outer woman, which is to say, she's found the person that she wants to present on the campaign trail, and that person is resolutely female. This time she seems to have decided to fully embrace her womanhood as an asset in her quest for the White House and to trust that the voters will do the same.

Of course, Hillary hasn't officially announced that she will be running for president -- and Universal Studios has not officially announced that there will be a sequel to the blockbuster "50 Shades of Grey." But it's hard to imagine 2016 happening without both of those things, seeing as how they both have such excellent prospects of success.

Hillary recently spoke at a Silicon Valley conference for women in the tech field with the theme of "Lead On." That lent itself nicely to the professional goals of the members of the audience as well as to Hillary's own leadership goals.

She spoke of the dearth of women not only in the tech field, but in the ranks of Fortune 500 CEO's. In fact, one recent diversity study found that the major S&P 1500 company boards had more men with the name John, Robert, William, or James on them than women of any name combined.

Left unsaid in her speech was any reference to the complete lack of a female occupant of the Oval Office thus far, but the thought could not have been far from anyone's mind, let alone Hillary's.

Clinton was comfortable talking at length about her own experiences being pregnant and giving birth while working as a partner in a law firm, and using that as a launching pad to discuss the importance of women in the workforce both here and around the world. And from there she highlighted her own work on behalf of the women of the world as secretary of state.

She segued into the discussion of the plight of working middle-class families that will be so central to the 2016 race, and the centrality of women's economic issues to those struggles of the middle-class. From there it was a natural progression to talking about 21st century families and the importance of things such as paid leave.

And all of that dovetailed perfectly into closing remarks about the future that revolved naturally around the birth in September of Clinton's first grandchild, Charlotte Clinton Mezvinsky. That brought up Hillary's new role as a grandmother, and the perspective it has given her on the future and what needs to be done to guarantee that it's the best possible future.

The Silicon Valley address could serve as a template for how Clinton intends to approach her career goals from the vantage point of being a woman seeking her own place in the workforce. In the coming weeks, which serendipitously happen to be part of Women's History Month, Hillary's speaking schedule is heavy with events and gatherings that center around women. If she's not running for president, then she could be gearing up to get a talk show on the Lifetime network.

All of which stands in stark contrast to Hillary's last presidential campaign. In 2008, she seemed to think that she had to reassure voters that a woman could be president, primarily by not accentuating the fact that she was a woman. This time around, there seems to be a shared assumption that, of course, a woman would make an excellent president, in part simply by virtue of being a woman.

In that previous campaign, Hillary ran as the most experienced candidate, primarily to draw a distinction between herself and her relatively less experienced challenger, Barack Obama. But now, almost eight years later, Clinton can let her experience speak for itself. She has more of it -- almost too much, from one perspective: She'll be 69 by the time the 2016 election takes place. So this time instead of highlighting her experience, she's highlighting the experiences she has in common with the women, mothers and grandmothers out there.

Of course, Hillary's message will have to resonate beyond female voters. Fortunately, the dynamics of the 21st century economy and the place of the family within it lend themselves to a family-friendly feminism.

We live in a society where women are necessary breadwinners whose income is counted upon for families to make it.

Gender pay equality and supportive work environments benefit spouses, children, extended families and entire communities. Today, feminism, family and economic issues intertwine like never before.

Hillary's stressing of the importance of women's workplace issues both to the family and to the struggles of the middle-class puts the Republicans on the defensive as they try to co-opt middle-class economic issues.

Potential GOP presidential candidates are already trying to position themselves to steal the thunder of the Democratic nominee when it comes to issues of wage inequality and middle-class stagnation. But how exactly do they propose to reinvigorate a middle-class that is overwhelmingly composed of families with two wage-earners if they don't fight for women's workplace issues? For instance, child care may be thought of as a woman's issue, but it's really a family issue, virtually by definition, and an economic issue on top of that.

Among topics that are sometimes seen as more traditional women's issues such as family planning, access to birth control and the right to choose, Hillary has the advantage in that she can make her stance clear, based on her life experiences as a woman. It's the Republicans with extremist views on these issues who have to dance around their real beliefs and avoid making outrageous and absurd statements such as embarrassing pronouncements about rape and pregnancy.

If Hillary seems more comfortable running as a woman, it's partly because society at large seems more comfortable with a populist-tinged feminism than it was in 2008. Patricia Arquette's Oscar night speech in support of equal pay for women -- although predictably dismissed by right-wing media such as Fox News -- was enthusiastically received by the public in general. In fact, far from being thought radical, Arquette's statements backstage were thoroughly deconstructed by the left for not being progressively correct enough.

Women have been steadily making strides in the years since Hillary's 2008 campaign, and as they did, they smoothed the way for one of their own to run for the highest office in the land without having to play down her gender.

Hillary is now wisely embracing her gender as a way of capturing the same "hope and change" historical quality of Obama's presidency. Voters always want change, and Hillary Clinton has been a constant on the political stage for decades now. She's certainly no stranger to Washington, or to the West Wing of the White House. But electing her president would still represent massive change on a fundamental level.

Hillary Clinton wants 2016 to be the Year of the Woman. And she wants to be The Woman.

No, gender wage gap is not that wide; Women need to ask for pay raises (USA Today)
By Katrina Trinko
March 2, 2015
USA Today

Hillary Clinton said Tuesday that she wants equal pay for women.

In lauding Patricia Arquette for using her acceptance speech as best supporting actress to advocate for women, Clinton said, "We all cheered at Patricia Arquette's speech at the Oscars because she's right. It's time to have wage equality once and for all."

But look at the numbers closely and it's clear, no matter how great a talking point wage equality is, that most women and men make about the same amount, when you factor in the industries where they are employed and their years of experience, along with decisions about whether to work part-time or at all when raising children.

So what is the wage gap?

In 2014, Clinton tweeted, "20 years ago, women made 72 cents on the dollar to men. Today it's still just 77 cents. More work to do. #EqualPay #NoCeilings"

Part-time work a factor

But that statistic simply doesn't take into account that a female preschool teacher who works part-time by choice won't make anywhere near what a male scientist who works full-time does.

And no one should know how these factors matter better than Hillary Clinton, who paid her own female Senate staffers 72 cents on the dollar, according to a February analysis by the conservative Washington Free Beacon.

Presumably, Clinton would attribute that wage gap to the differences in the roles between the staffers, not to sexism on her part. In fact, a 2009 Labor Department report found that the real gender wage gap was about 5 cents per dollar.

Of course, 5 cents on the dollar isn't acceptable. But it's not clear that it's discrimination at work or that this is a situation politicians such as Clinton should seek to involve the government in. One factor could be women's reluctance to ask for raises.

Pay increase angst

A 2014 survey by Glamour found that 43% of women had asked for a raise in their current job vs. 54% of men, and only 39% had asked for more than the amount offered -- again, vs. 54% of men. That's a problem.

It's not easy to ask for a raise -- and I remember my first time asking for a raise as an excruciatingly stressful and unpleasant experience. I wanted my boss to just simply recognize my good work and give me a raise. I felt humiliated and weird about having to aggressively make the case for my own work's merit.

But I did it -- and got a raise.

Women do need to close the last of the gap. They should also continue to work toward top leadership positions, in which women are routinely significantly outnumbered by men.

But personal initiative, not politicians' interference, is the way forward.

Will the Clinton Foundation Come to Haunt Hillary? (Bloomberg)
By David Knowles
March 1, 2015
Bloomberg

Hillary Clinton's political enemies believe they may have finally located her Achilles' Heel.

In the days following a Washington Post report that the Clinton Foundation accepted millions of dollars in donations from foreign governments while Clinton served as secretary of state, and that a $500,000 contribution from the government of Algeria potentially violated an ethics agreement with the Obama White House, criticism of the Democratic presidential frontrunner has been pointed, especially from her would-be Republican rivals.

On Sunday, former Texas Governor Rick Perry framed the issue as one of trust.

“Are you going to trust an individual who has taken that much money from a foreign source? Where’s your loyalty?” Perry told CNN’s Dana Bash. “I’m really concerned, not just going forward, but what has been received at the Clinton Foundation over the course of years and how that affects this individual’s judgment.”

At last week's Conservative Political Action Conference, the Clinton Foundation donations rose to the top of the list in terms of Hillary attack lines.

“Mrs. Clinton, name an accomplishment. And in the meantime, please explain why we should accept that the millions and millions of dollars that have flowed into the Clinton Global Initiative from foreign governments do not represent a conflict of interest,” prospective GOP presidential candidate Carly Fiorina declared.

"We could have had Hillary here, but we couldn't find a foreign nation to foot the bill," joked Senator Ted Cruz.

On social media, Clinton's foes have been hammering the former secretary of state over the donations.

The criticism was not just from those hoping to see Clinton go down to defeat in the 2016 election. California Democratic Representative Jane Harmann called the failure to disclose the donations "troubling."

“Yes, there was a process set up. All of the other contributions were reviewed, as I understand it. There was transparency. This was an unsolicited donation of $500,000 at a time when U.S. was deluged with help for Haiti,' Harman said on Fox News Sunday. "I guess it got lost in the system. I think it needs to be explained. I don’t understand why the money wasn’t returned, or after the fact, approval wasn’t sought.”

In a statement released last week, the Clinton Foundation admitted its error with Algerian donation.

“Immediately following the devastating earthquake in Haiti on January 12, 2010, the Embassy of Algeria made an unsolicited donation of $500K to [the] Clinton Foundation Haiti Relief fund,” a foundation spokesman said in a statement issued Wednesday. “This donation was disclosed publicly on the Clinton Foundation website, however, the State Department should have also been formally informed. This was a one-time, specific donation to help Haiti and Algeria had not donated to the Clinton Foundation before and has not since.”

Hillary Clinton, however, has yet to speak publicly on the matter.

As to whether foreign government donations to her family foundation should preclude her from becoming president, as they might result in influence-peddling, initial investigations, including one by the Wall Street Journal, have yet to turn up any evidence of illegality. Clinton's supporters, meanwhile, are brushing the criticisms aside, citing the work the charity does.

"If the biggest attack on Hillary's going to be that she raised too much money for her charity, okay, I'll take that," Virginia Governor Terry McAuliffe told the Washington Post. "No one's alleging anything beyond that she raised money and people gave her money and foreign governments gave her money. At the end of the day, that's fine. It went to a charity. It helped a lot of people."

On its website, the Clinton Foundation also seemed to be preparing for what seems like Clinton's inevitable White House run.

"Should Secretary Clinton decide to run for office, we will continue to ensure the Foundation's policies and practices regarding support from international partners are appropriate, just as we did when she served as Secretary of State," a statement read.

Rick Perry Questions Hillary Clinton's Ethical Judgment (Washington Post)
By Jose A. DelReal
March 1, 2015
The Washington Post

Former Texas governor Rick Perry is raising questions about Hillary Clinton's ethical judgment after reports that her family's foundation received millions of dollars from foreign governments during her tenure as secretary of state.

"Are you going to trust an individual who has taken that much money from a foreign source? Where's your loyalty?" Perry, who is considering a 2016 White House bid, told CNN's Dana Bash in an interview airing Sunday. "I'm really concerned, not just going forward, but what has been received at the Clinton Foundation over the course of years and how that affects this individual's judgment."

A Washington Post report last week revealed that the Clinton Foundation — which is a philanthropic organization — accepted donations from seven foreign governments. At least one of the donations reportedly violated an ethics agreement between Clinton and the Obama administration.

"It's not only the appearance of impropriety. It's also the ethical side of this that, I think, most Americans really have a problem with," Perry said.

Perry also addressed a small dust-up between himself and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who appeared to compare labor protesters in the United States to Islamic State terrorists during a speech at the Conservative Political Action Conference on Thursday. Responding to the remarks, Perryt old MSNBC that the comparison was "inappropriate."

During the CNN interview Sunday, however, the former Texas governor said he accepted Walker's explanation.

"I think the initial response when I heard that: 'That's not right. You don't make that connect.' The governor has gone back and clarified his remarks since then and clearly said that's not what he was talking about," Perry said. "I respect that clarification and support him on that."

Rick Perry Questions Hillary's 'loyalty' (MSNBC)
By Jane C. Timm
March 1, 2015
MSNBC

Following a weekend full of conservative attacks on Hillary Clinton at the Conservative Political Action Conference, former Texas Governor Rick Perry added to the list, questioning the former secretary of state's "loyalty" in an interview that aired Sunday.

Responding to news that the Clinton foundation had not notified the State Department when it previously accepted a donation from a foreign nation, Perry argued that Clinton was disloyal.

"I think it falls flat in the face of the American people when it comes to, are you going to trust an individual who has taken that much money from a foreign source? Where's your loyalty?" Perry said in an interview that aired on CNN's "State of the Union."

The donation – from Algeria – was for $500,000 and came right after the Haiti earthquake. All of the funds were distributed for relief there. The Clinton Foundation is a nonprofit that focuses on issues like economic and leadership development and health security. Since 2010, they've raised a total of $36 million for Haiti efforts.

"Are you going to trust an individual who has taken that much money from a foreign source?" Perry asked.

The foundation acknowledged they should have alerted officials about the donation from the country.

"As the Clinton Foundation did with all donations it received for earthquake relief, the entire amount of Algeria's contribution was distributed as aid in Haiti," the statement said. "This donation was disclosed publicly on the Clinton Foundation website, however, the State Department should have also been formally informed."

But Perry said Americans will question this.

"I'm really concerned that – not just going forward—but what has been received at the Clinton Foundation over the course of the years and how that affects this individual's judgment," Perry said.

Perry is actively exploring a second presidential bid; he joined the crowded Republican field and spoke at this weekend's Conservative Political Action Conference, but Perry barely registered on the event's straw poll, earning just 1.1% of the votes.

Dem: I'm troubled by Hillary donation controversy (The Hill)
By Rebecca Shabad
March 1, 2015
The Hill

Former Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.) said Sunday that's she troubled by the Clinton Foundation's failure to disclose foreign donations it accepted while Hillary Clinton was still secretary of State.

On "Fox News Sunday," Harman was asked whether the latest reports bother her.

"Yes, there was a process set up. All of the other contributions were reviewed, as I understand it. There was transparency. This was an unsolicited donation of $500,000 at a time when U.S. was deluged with help for Haiti. I guess it got lost in the system. I think it needs to be explained. I don't understand why the money wasn't returned, or after the fact, approval wasn't sought."

The Clinton Foundation recently admitted that it had received an unsolicited donation of $500,000 for its Haiti earthquake relief fund from the Algerian government in 2010.
"I think the appearance of what is happening is poor," said Harman, who serves as president of the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars.

Harman said it's okay for foreign governments to give limited amounts of money to groups as long as it's disclosed.

Clinton is expected to run for president next year and would be considered the Democratic frontrunner.

Hillary Clinton Already Is a Brand (Bloomberg)
By Albert Hunt
March 1, 2015
Bloomberg View

Hillary Clinton has enlisted a Coca-Cola marketing whiz to help brand her expected presidential campaign.

This is quintessential Clinton. The most politically savvy couple in America has a penchant for seeking out the latest shiny toy, a magic bullet to make everything work.

By many accounts, the Coca-Cola executive, Wendy Clark, is able. She has worked closely with Roy Spence, a longtime Clinton ally. But more than branding or marketing, it'll be experience, ideas, vision and character that will determine the success of Clinton's presidential quest. The Clintons usually don't do well when they lose sight of that.

Their most infamous miscalculation of this kind was in late 1994, when in the depths of Bill Clinton's presidency, the couple secretly turned to a political consultant named Dick Morris to fix things. He came up with a bunch of small bore issues and then told the press Clinton would run as a moral guide for the country.

This recasting had little bearing on Clinton's re-election in 1996. In any case, Morris wasn't around to enjoy that triumph: He had to step down after he was found to have hosted a call girl in a Washington hotel room paid for by the Clinton campaign, and had let his companion listen to his conversations with the president.

There are plenty of other examples, though they are more benign.

After a rocky start in the White House, Bill Clinton enlisted a smart veteran Republican, David Gergen, as a cure-all. It was mismatch from the get-go. The Clintons later turned to self-help promoter and motivational pitchman Tony Robbins.

This time around, there are reports that Hillary Clinton was ecstatic when pollster Joel Benenson joined her probable team, believing that he would bring the secret formula that helped catapult Barack Obama. Benenson is very capable, but he didn't perform magic and he isn't any better than Geoff Garin, who was Clinton's pollster in 2008.

In fact, the former secretary of state has already made her most important hire: John Podesta, the veteran Democratic operative, who will be her campaign chairman. He is the Democrats' equivalent of Jim Baker -- the legendary Republican in the Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations -- with unsurpassed judgment and potentially the ability to bring order to the unwieldy Clinton constellation and talk to the candidate, and her spouse, as a semi-peer.

Podesta appreciates the need to bring in fresh faces such as Benenson and maybe Clark. One of the flaws of the 2008 Clinton campaign was its insularity.

Another major -- and even bigger -- shortcoming was that she followed the advice of chief strategist Mark Penn for her to run as a tough commander-in-chief who supported the Iraq War. The tactic, which de-emphasized her gender, was a misreading of the times. Obama, who defeated her, understood that.

There have been many reports that this time, Hillary Clinton will strongly stress women's issues and the gender angle. She's been a feminist her entire adult life; the only difficulty here would be if the effort looks too contrived.

All campaigns adapt or tweak their pitch to meet political realities. In 2008, Obama didn't really oppose gay marriage, and one wonders if Jeb Bush really believes the Iraq War was such a noble undertaking, as he suggested in a recent speech in Chicago.

Clinton will also adjust. But as she tries to convey a vision for governing, she's going to have to run as who she is: smart, if not especially innovative; disciplined; experienced in the ways of Washington and the world; hawkish on national security (witness her leading role in the military intervention in Libya in 2011, and her support for the Iraq War in 2002); and moderately liberal on domestic issues with a bit of a soft spot for Wall Street.

No amount of rebranding will change those basics.

For Hillary and Bibi, a long and sometimes fraught relationship (Washington Post)
By Anne Gearan
March 1, 2015
Washington Post

JERUSALEM — The phone call between Hillary Rodham Clinton and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu lasted 45 minutes. For 43 of them, she talked and he listened.

The U.S. secretary of state lectured the Israeli leader, accusing him of trying to do an end run around American opposition to settlement-building and embarrassing Vice President Biden during a visit to Israel, according to interviews with people present during the 2010 call or who were briefed on it afterward. She read from a script for part of the lecture, so as not to miss any key points.

“The word ‘humiliation’ appeared very prominently,” recalled Michael Oren, then the Israeli ambassador in Washington. “As in ‘You have humiliated the United States of America.’ ”

There probably aren’t many times in Netanyahu’s professional life when he has listened to anyone for 43 minutes. Netanyahu prefers to do the lecturing, as he will Tuesday when he addresses a joint meeting of Congress over the objections of the Obama administration.

And there aren’t many people who could make Netanyahu sit still for a tongue-lashing. Clinton is one of them.

“I was often the designated yeller,” Clinton said last year.

Should Clinton win the presidency in 2016, her long and complicated history with Netanyahu will enter a new phase. If Netanyahu survives an election this month, the same issues that cloud the U.S.-Israel relationship now — negotiations with the Palestinians and a disagreement over outreach to Iran that turned sharply bitter over Netanyahu’s Tuesday address — will almost certainly still fester.

From Netanhayu’s perspective, Clinton would be an improvement over President Obama, who has all but washed his hands of an Israeli leader he finds overbearing, Israeli officials and observers said in interviews here.

But there is also little doubt that Netanyahu would prefer a more hawkish Republican in the White House, these observers said. The question is how brazenly he will make that preference known, as he did in 2012 when he was widely perceived as supporting Obama’s GOP opponent, Mitt Romney.

Clinton hosted Netanyahu at the White House as first lady, and their relationship grew more substantive when she was a reliable pro-Israel voice in the Senate and dispenser of tough love to the Israeli government during Obama’s first term.

As secretary of state, Clinton defended Israeli security demands and sharply criticized settlement policies.

On orders from the White House, she demanded a total freeze of settlement expansion — a demand that made Netanyahu livid.

She also praised him publicly for taking “unprecedented” steps toward peace, defended Israeli military action in the Gaza Strip in 2012 and nudged Netanyahu into a cease-fire with old-fashioned shuttle diplomacy.

“I learned that Bibi would fight if he felt he was being cornered, but if you connected with him as a friend, there was a chance you could get something done together,” Clinton wrote in her State Department memoir last year.

The speech fracas

That chance appears remote now, at the nadir of Netanyahu’s relationship with the Obama administration.

The White House considers the Israeli leader’s address to Congress partisan meddling intended to sink a potential nuclear deal with Iran. Democrats complain it is another example of Netanyahu’s undisguised preference for Republicans, and many plan to boycott. Netanyahu is speaking at the invitation of the Republican-led Congress.

Netanyahu says he has no choice, because the emerging deal leaves Israel exposed to a potential nuclear strike.

“I respect the White House and the U.S. president. But on a serious subject, it’s my duty to do everything for Israel’s security,” Netanyahu said at a campaign rally last week.

The speech reflects an utter break between Netanyahu and Obama. In bypassing the White House and scheduling Tuesday’s speech just before Israelis vote in a national election, Netanyahu had “injected a degree of partisanship, which is not only unfortunate,” national security adviser Susan E. Rice said on PBS last week, “I think it’s destructive of the fabric of the relationship.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Secretary of State John F. Kerry, who succeeded Clinton as secretary of state in 2013, sought to play down any tensions Sunday, however. “We have an unparalleled close security relationship with Israel, and we will continue to,” Kerry said on ABC’s “This Week.”

The U.S. critiques are being delivered indirectly now, in contrast with the 2010 Clinton phone call.

Netanyahu will not see Obama, Biden or Kerry during his brief visit to Washington. The White House has offered a diplomatic fig leaf, saying it would be unseemly to host Netanyahu so close to the March 17 elections. Netanyahu is not likely to cross paths with Clinton either, although she is delivering a speech in Washington on Tuesday evening.

Netanyahu is also addressing a gathering of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee on Monday. Clinton, a frequent speaker in years past, will not address the group.

She has said nothing about the controversy surrounding Netanyahu’s congressional speech but is on the record as strongly supporting the Obama administration’s approach to negotiating with Iran.

The goal of international talks now nearing a deadline this month is a deal to curb Iran’s nuclear program and ensure it cannot be quickly converted to bomb-making. Clinton told an audience in Canada in January that the talks, initiated by secret contacts during her tenure as top diplomat, would be damaged by any new Iran sanctions applied by Congress.

Wary respect

Clinton’s tough line with Netanyahu was born of a two-decades-old acquaintance built on wary respect and a shared sense that each can do business with the other.

Their relationship did not seem to suffer from the rougher patches during Clinton’s tenure as secretary of state, officials said. Clinton and Netanyahu made a point of showing no hard feelings when Clinton visited Israel just two months after the March 2010 settlement debacle and telephonic dressing-down.

Clinton quotes Netanyahu from his brief portion of that phone call in her 2014 State Department memoir, “Hard Choices.”

“Let me assure you and the president that the timing was entirely unintentional and unfortunate,” she said Netanyahu told her.

“I didn’t enjoy playing the bad cop, but it was part of the job,” Clinton wrote.

The longtime Likud leader and the likely Democratic presidential contender have sparred and made up enough times to regard one another as worthy adversaries, U.S. and Israeli officials and former officials said. They are familiar with one another in public — she calls him “Bibi.” He calls her “Hillary.” But they are not close personal friends.

“Her relationship with him is very bad, just not as toxic as Obama’s,” said Alon Pinkas, who was Israel’s consul general in New York when Clinton was a pro-Israel senator from New York.

“As much as it is replete with dislikes and misunderstandings, the relationship has the potential to succeed” if both politicians face one another as national leaders in 2017, Pinkas added. “I suspect it won’t, because he can’t help himself.”

Many other observers, including Israeli and U.S. officials who would not speak for the record, described the relationship in more optimistic terms.

“They have a long relationship of mutual intellectual respect,” Oren said. “They both are very, very smart people, and people of very strong physical stamina.”

Other similarities: ambition, determination and a shared declaration that the bond between their two nations may stretch thin at times but will never break.

In her memoir, Clinton calls Netanyahu a “complicated figure” whose hawkish views were shaped by his military and family experiences.

“Despite our policy differences, Netanyahu and I worked together as partners and friends. We argued frequently, often during phone calls that would go on for over an hour, sometimes two. But even when we disagreed, we maintained an unshakable commitment to the alliance between our countries,” Clinton wrote.

When Clinton was first lady and Netanyahu was the opposition Likud leader and then prime minister, she and then-President

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bill Clinton chafed at Netanyahu's perceived cozy relationship with the Clintons' adversaries. His Republican contacts included then-House Speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) and evangelical leader Ralph Reed.

For his part, Netanyahu was outraged in 1999 when Hillary Clinton sat by as Palestine Liberation Organization Chairman Yasser Arafat's wife, Suha, accused Israel of poisoning Palestinians and then closed their joint appearance with an embrace.

Clinton and Netanyahu dealt with one another occasionally during the years Clinton was in the Senate and Netanyahu held two cabinet posts. He returned as prime minister in 2009, the year that Clinton — having lost the 2008 Democratic presidential nominating contest — joined Obama's Cabinet as secretary of state.

Netanyahu has been the top Israeli leader for all but a few months of the Obama administration, and he called early elections in anticipation of keeping the job. Although opposition figure Isaac Herzog leads slightly in national polls, Netanyahu has the better chance of forming a government, Israeli and U.S. officials said.

Clinton became the chief public voice for the administration's insistence on a settlement freeze in 2009, despite her misgivings that it set too high a bar for Israel. Although viewed as friendlier to Israeli security arguments than Obama, she never wavered from the administration line in her dealings with Netanyahu, U.S. and Israeli officials said.

"There was no wink and a nod, no 'This is what we're asking, but I really think something different,' " said one official who was present in many of their meetings.

Netanyahu rejected the U.S. position out of hand, however, and in her book, Clinton called the U.S. position misguided. "In retrospect, our early hard line on settlements didn't work," she wrote.

Under pressure from Clinton and U.S. envoy George J. Mitchell, Netanyahu adopted a partial, time-limited freeze to help set the tone for talks.

A 10-month moratorium went into effect in late 2009, but it did not lead to productive or sustained negotiations. Clinton jawboned Netanyahu for more than five hours to extend the moratorium during a meeting in New York in September 2010. Although he eventually agreed, Netanyahu could not sell the extension to his cabinet and the moratorium expired.

The Palestinian peace issue largely languished for the remainder of Obama's first term. Kerry resumed an intensive push for a settlement that fell apart nearly a year ago despite his long association with Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Possible future partners

If Netanyahu and Obama have written off hopes for their relationship during Obama's nearly two years left in office, Netanyahu may see brighter prospects for the next president.

Netanyahu's Likud party is ideologically close to traditional Republican policy positions, and Netanyahu has not been shy about his connections to Republicans including Romney, an old friend from Netanyahu's years living in the United States.

None of the current crop of Republican presidential hopefuls appears likely to try to muscle Netanyahu on the Palestinian issue, and many of them share his doubts on the potential Iran deal.

Netanyahu posted a Twitter message thanking likely Republican presidential contender Jeb Bush for supporting his Iran speech.

"You're welcome Mr. Prime Minister, I'm anxious to hear what you have to say!" replied the former Florida governor.

Should Clinton win the White House, however, she and Netanyahu would probably forge an efficient bond, U.S. and Israeli observers said.

"I'd bet that under either a third Bush or a second Clinton, things might not be great between the United States and Netanyahu, but they would be better than they are right now," Wilson Center Mideast scholar Aaron David Miller wrote last week in Foreign Policy.

The Iran deal at issue now is likely to be resolved before the 2016 election, but not the underlying fear for Israelis that Iran remains what Netanyahu calls an "existential" threat next door. Clinton is on record voicing much the same concern, along with doubts that Iran would abide by any deal it struck.

If a deal is signed, Clinton would carry it forward but would probably also find ways to reassure Netanyahu that the United States will not be hoodwinked.

And unless the West Bank security and political situation deteriorates rapidly or Netanyahu severely overplays his hand on settlements, a President Hillary Clinton would be unlikely to push Netanyahu very far on a peace settlement, U.S. and Israeli observers said.

A prevailing view among Mideast watchers is that the next big U.S. peace push would probably wait for a different Israeli leader.

“She will keep good relations with Netanyahu if he gives her a semblance of movement, and they can all kick the can together,” said a senior Israeli official who requested anonymity because Netanyahu has not yet secured another term.

“Hillary can’t afford to fight Netanyahu unless she has a smoking gun, and he’s too smart to give her a smoking gun.”

American right unholsters surest shot against Hillary (The Sunday Times)
By Toby Harnden
March 1, 2015
The Sunday Times
SHE has shattered glass ceilings throughout her career, showing herself able to rise to the top in a man's world, and now seems poised to try to win the most powerful job in the world.

But the neatly dressed blonde who wowed a raucous crowd inside a convention centre outside Washington was not Hillary Clinton, the Democratic favourite for the White House in 2016, but rather Carly Fiorina, the first woman to lead a company in the Fortune 20 liist of the biggest US businesses.

Fiorina has cleverly positioned herself as the "anti-Hillary", the only woman in a Republican field of more than a dozen men and the candidate most prepared to mount relentless attacks on the former US secretary of state — including a few that a male opponent might struggle to get away with.

A former chief executive of Hewlett-Packard, Fiorina, 60, has never held political office and failed in her 2010 attempt to win a Senate seat in California.

While this may make her an unlikely Republican nominee, conservative activists are tipping her as a possible vicepresidential pick, not least because she could help neutralise Clinton.

Preferring skirts to her rival's trademark trouser suits, she spoke last week at the annual Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC) in Maryland, and served up plenty of red meat for party activists hungry for ideas about how to defeat Clinton.

Presenting herself as a freemarket conservative and foreign policy hawk, Fiorina boasted of having done business in more than 80 countries and of serving for several years on the advisory board of the CIA. She spoke of knowing King Abdullah of Jordan and Binyamin Netanyahu, the Israeli prime minister.

"I have met Vladimir Putin, and I know that his ambition will not be deterred by a gimmicky red 'reset' button," she said, referring to her talks with the Russian president at an Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation event in China and the ill-fated "reset" in relations with the Kremlin announced by Clinton in 2009.

She also mocked Clinton — the Democrat frontrunner due to declare her candidacy by the summer— for boasting that she flew nearly 1m miles during her four years as secretary of state.

"Like Mrs Clinton, I too have travelled the globe," Fiorina said. "Unlike Mrs Clinton, I know that flying is an activity, not an accomplishment."

Fiorina lambasted Clinton over foreign donations to her family foundation.

"Mrs Clinton, please name an accomplishment," Fiorina demanded. "And in the meantime, please explain why we should accept that the millions and millions of dollars that have flowed into the Clinton Global Initiative from foreign governments doesn't represent a conflict of interest."

Fiorina, who first emerged on the political scene as an adviser to Senator John McCain when he was the Republican nominee in 2008, showed a softer side too, talking of her battle with cancer and her stepdaughter's death.

She seems to have got under the skin of the Clinton camp, which has bristled at suggestions their candidate copied the title of her 2014 book Hard Choices from Fiorina's 2007 memoir Tough Choices.

Last week Clinton aides were forced to deny claims she had stolen the phrase "unlock their full potential" from Fiorina, whose organisation is the Unlocking Potential Project.

After Fiorina's speech the Democratic National committee sent out emails linking to articles criticising Fiorina's tenure at Hewlett-Packard.

"Carly Fiorina lacks Secretary Clinton's resumé when it comes to serving and empowering working families and middle-class Americans," wrote Adrienne Elrod, of Correct the Record, a pro-Clinton group. "Hillary's resumé is one of success and this is why Ms Fiorina attacks Hillary and her work to protect children and help every American reach their potential." The CPAC was an opportunity for the full range of potential 2016 Republican presidential candidates to set out their wares.

Jeb Bush, the early frontrunner, was credited with a deft performance in front of an audience containing many who viewed him as suspiciously moderate.

Senator Rand Paul, a libertarian running against the party establishment, was expected to win the CPAC straw poll for the third year in a row; an outcome, his opponents groused, that was down in large part to his favouring legalising marijuana for medical use — a reform backed by the young activists who dominate the gathering.

We first need to give diplomacy a chance

Editor's note: this is reprinted from the Bloomfield Democrat.

There are some events that get riveted in our memories and remain there decades later.

For me, the autumn of 1962 was one of those times. This 12-year-old kid was scared back then like he had never been scared before — or after.

During 13 days that October, the world watched with growing anxiety as the two superpowers, the United States and the Soviet Union, moved to the brink of nuclear war. The crisis began when U.S. military spy planes gathered photographic evidence that Soviet ballistic missiles were being installed in Cuba, just 90 miles from the United States.

http://mediamattersaction.org/factcheck/201001270009

VA Gov. McDonnell: Brand New Face, Same Old Lies

> Newly inaugurated Governor Bob McDonnell was tapped by Republican Party leaders to deliver the official GOP response to President Obama's first State of the Union address. While McDonnell's face may be fresh, his speech repeated a slew of the same old, worn out, debunked Republican talking points.

Wrong On Economic Recovery

Gov. Bob McDonnell:

> Today, the federal government is simply trying to do too much.
> Last year, we were told that massive new federal spending would create more jobs 'immediately' and hold unemployment below 8%.
> In the past year, over three million Americans have lost their jobs, yet the Democratic Congress continues deficit spending, adding to the bureaucracy, and increasing the national debt on our children and grandchildren. [McDonnell Prepared Remarks, 1/27/10]

CBO: The American Recovery And Reinvestment Act Has Created Up To 1.6 Million American Jobs. According to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, "CBO now estimates that in the third quarter of calendar year 2009, ARRA's policies raised real GDP by between 1.2 percent and 3.2 percent, lowered the unemployment rate by between 0.3 and 0.9 percentage points, and increased the number of people employed by between 600,000 and 1.6 million compared with what those values would have been otherwise." [CBO, 11/30/09 ; emphasis added]

CBPP: Recovery Act Is Keeping 6 Million Americans Out Of Poverty. According to the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, "Although meant chiefly to help the broad economy, the stimulus plan Congress enacted earlier this year (the American Recovery and Re-Investment Act of 2009, or ARRA) had the important secondary effect of significantly ameliorating the recession's impact on poverty. This analysis, which comes one day before the Census Bureau will release updated poverty figures (for 2008), examines seven of the recovery act's provisions - two improvements in unemployment insurance, three tax credits for working families, an increase in food stamps, and a one-time payment for retirees, veterans, and people with disabilities - and finds that they alone are preventing more than 6 million Americans from falling below the poverty line and are reducing the severity of poverty for 33 million more. Those 6 million people include more than 2 million children and over 500,000 seniors. This analysis includes state-specific estimates for California, Texas, Florida, New York, and Illinois." [CBPP, 9/9/09]

Wrong On The Budget Deficit

Gov. Bob McDonnell:

> In the past year, over three million Americans have lost their jobs, yet the Democratic Congress continues deficit spending, adding to the bureaucracy, and increasing the national debt on our children and grandchildren.
> The amount of this debt is on pace to double in five years, and triple in ten. The federal debt is already over $100,000 per household. [McDonnell Prepared Remarks, 1/27/10]

Note: The FY 2009 deficit was $1.4 trillion .

Before Obama Took Office, The FY 2009 Deficit Was Projected At $1.2 Trillion. According to the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Washington Times: "President-elect Barack Obama vowed Wednesday to tackle Social Security and Medicare spending as this year's deficit was projected to reach $1.2 trillion and with Congress preparing to run that figure even higher with its economic recovery package. [...] The Congressional Budget Office announced a projected fiscal 2009 deficit of $1.2 trillion even if Congress doesn't enact any new programs." The paper added: "About the only person who was silent on the deficit projection was Mr. Bush, who took office facing a surplus but who saw spending balloon and the country notch the highest deficits on record." [Washington Times, 1/8/09 ; emphasis added]

National Debt More Than Doubled Under Republican President Bush

- 2001: The National Debt Was $5.7 Trillion When President Bush Assumed Office. On January 19, 2001, the day before President Bush was sworn in as President, the national debt was $5,727,776,738,304.64. [U.S. Treasury Department, accessed 4/14/09]
- 2009: The National Debt Was $10.6 Trillion When President Bush Left Office. On January 20, 2009, the day before President Bush was sworn in as President, the national debt was $10,626,877,048,913.08. [U.S. Treasury Department, accessed 4/14/09]

Wrong On Republican "Cooperation"

Gov. Bob McDonnell:

> We want results, not rhetoric. We want cooperation, not partisanship.
> There is much common ground. [McDonnell Prepared Remarks, 1/27/10]

Republicans Have Shown Absolutely NO Interest In "Cooperation" Or "Results":

Michael Steele , 12/10/09: "The Democrats have accused us of trying to delay, stall, slow down, and stop this bill...They are right. We do want to delay, stall, slow down, and ultimately stop them from experimenting on our nation's health care."

Sen. Jim DeMint , 7/17/09: "If we're able to stop Obama on this, it will be his Waterloo, it will break him."

Sen. Chuck Grassley , 7/6/09: "'I take pride with being an obstructionist,' he said, if that means scuttling a public option that could lead to a single-payer system."

Sen. Chuck Grassley , 9/1/09: "The only way to get a bipartisan agreement is to defeat a Democratic proposal."

Rep. Steve King , 8/25/09: "I think it's time to really slow down or stop the negotiations with the Democrats."

Wrong About Americans' Views Toward Health Care

Gov. Bob McDonnell:

> All Americans agree, we need a health care system that is affordable, accessible, and high quality.
> But most Americans do not want to turn over the best medical care system in the world to the federal government. [McDonnell Prepared Remarks, 1/27/10]

Poll: Americans Support Current Bill, Want It Strengthened. CBS News released a telling poll on January 11, 2010. Regarding extending coverage to the uninsured, the poll showed that 57% of Americans support the current plan or want it stronger - only 32% believe it goes too far. On controlling health care costs, 60% support the plan or want it to go even further - only 24% think it goes too far. And concerning new regulations on health insurance companies, 61% support the plan or want it stronger - only 27% believe it goes too far.

Wrong On The Republican Health Care "Plan"

Gov. Bob McDonnell:

> Republicans in Congress have offered legislation to reform healthcare, without shifting Medicaid costs to the states, without cutting Medicare, and without raising your taxes. [McDonnell Prepared Remarks, 1/27/10]

GOP Plan Costs $61 Billion And Leaves 52 Million Americans Uninsured. The Los Angeles Times

reported the CBO put the cost of the Republican bill at $61 billion over ten years, "[b]ut the CBO analysis also concluded that under the GOP plan, 52 million nonelderly Americans would have no insurance in 2019 -- even more than the 50 million in 2010." [Los Angeles Times, 11/5/09]

- GOP Plan Only Offers Coverage To 3 Million More Americans Over Ten Years. According to the CBO: "By 2019, CBO and JCT estimate, the number of nonelderly people without health insurance would be reduced by about 3 million relative to current law, leaving about 52 million nonelderly residents uninsured." [CBO.gov, 11/4/09]

- GOP Plan Keeps Number Of Uninsured At Same Rate As Current System. The CBO also noted: "The share of nonelderly resident with insurance coverage in 2019 would be about 83 percent, roughly in line with the current share. CBO and JCT estimate that enacting the amendment's insurance coverage provisions would increase deficits by $8 billion over the 2010-2019 period." [CBO.gov, 11/4/09]

GOP Bill Allows Insurance Companies To Deny Americans Coverage For Pre-Existing Conditions. In his write up of the Republican bill's CBO score, Jonathan Cohn wrote, "under the Republican bills, the CBO notes, there will be enormous variation in rates between the sick and the healthy. Remember, unlike the Democrats, the Republicans--in their determination to avoid passing new regulations--wouldn't prohibit charging people more because they have pre-existing conditions or would otherwise represent greater-than-average health risks." [The New Republic, 11/5/09]

GOP Bill Increases Premiums For Sick Americans. Jonathan Cohn of The New Republic wrote, "yes, the Republican health care bill will lower premiums overall. But many people in poor health will see their premiums go up. And many people will get lower premiums only because they're getting inferior coverage. Meanwhile, more than 50 million people will have no insurance whatsoever." [The New Republic, 11/5/09]

Wrong On Energy

Gov. Bob McDonnell:

> But this Administration's policies are delaying offshore production, hindering nuclear energy expansion, and seeking to impose job-killing cap and trade energy taxes.
> Now is the time to adopt innovative energy policies that create jobs and lower energy prices. [McDonnell Prepared Remarks, 1/27/10]

A Clean Energy Standard Would Save $95 Billion On Energy & Gas Bills. According to the Center for American Progress: "A national renewable electricity standard, a key piece of the clean energy legislation currently before Congress, would save households and businesses in every state billions of dollars in electricity and natural gas bills... The numbers come from the Union of Concerned Scientists, who earlier this year analyzed a renewable electricity standard that would aim to have 25 percent of our electricity come from renewable sources by 2025. They found that this standard would save families and businesses $95 billion in electricity and natural gas bills through 2030 and spur new investments and hundreds of thousands of new clean-energy jobs." [Center for American Progress, 5/19/09]

Clean Energy Legislation Would Boost GDP By Up To $111 Billion. According to the University of California-Berkeley: "Comprehensive clean energy and climate protection legislation, like the American Clean Energy and Security Act (ACES) that was passed by the House of Representatives in June, would strengthen the U.S. economy by establishing pollution limits and incentives that together will drive large-scale investments in clean energy and energy efficiency...New analysis by the University of California shows conclusively that climate policy will strengthen the U.S. economy as a whole. Full adoption of the ACES package of pollution reduction and energy efficiency measures would ... boost GDP by $39 billion-$111 billion. These economic gains are over and above the growth the U.S. would see in the absence of such a bill." [UC Berkeley, accessed 1/22/10]

Investment In Clean Energy Technology Would Create Up To 1.9 Million American Jobs. According to the University of California-Berkeley, "new analysis by the University of California shows conclusively that climate policy will strengthen the U.S. economy as a whole. Full adoption of the ACES package of pollution reduction and energy efficiency measures would create between 918,000 and 1.9 million new jobs." [UC Berkeley, accessed 1/22/10]

- Investment In Clean Energy Technology Creates FOUR TIMES As Many Jobs As An Investment In Oil & Gas. According to the Center for American Progress, "spending $1 million on energy efficiency and renewable energy produces a much larger expansion of employment than spending the same amount on fossil fuels or nuclear energy. Among fossil fuels, job creation in coal is about 32 percent greater than that for oil and natural gas. The employment creation for energy efficiency-retrofitting and mass transit-is 2.5

> times to four times larger than that for oil and natural gas. With renewable energy, the job creation ranges between 2.5 times to three times more than that for oil and gas." [Center for American Progress, The Economic Benefits of Investing in Clean Energy, 6/17/09]

Wrong On Homeland Security

Gov. Bob McDonnell:

> Americans were shocked on Christmas Day to learn of the attempted bombing of a flight to Detroit. This foreign terror suspect was given the same legal rights as a U.S. citizen, and immediately stopped providing critical intelligence. [McDonnell Prepared Remarks, 1/27/10]

Once Apprehended, The U.S. "Gleaned Usable Action Intelligence" From Abdulmutallab. As reported by Reuters:

> A Nigerian charged in the incident, Umar Farouk Abdulmutallab, spent months in Yemen and told investigators he had trained with al Qaeda militants who took refuge there to plot attacks against Americans.
> The White House says he is already providing useful information. "Abdulmutallab spent a number of hours with FBI investigators in which we gleaned usable actionable intelligence," spokesman Robert Gibbs said on Tuesday.
> That could be valuable in light of reports that Abdulmutallab, who attempted to blow up a transatlantic airliner as it approached Detroit, told investigators after he was captured that more attackers like him were on the way.
> "We are continuing to look at ways that we can extract that information from him," Obama's top counterterrorism adviser John Brennan said on Sunday. "I think we have to assume that there are others out there." [Reuters, 1/6/10]

National Journal: "Clinton Supporters Don't Mind Waiting for a Campaign Kickoff"

[Subtitle:] Absence makes the heart grow fonder for the former secretary of State.

December 11, 2014 Hillary Clinton is keeping her closest supporters waiting for any sign of a presidential campaign announcement. But they don't mind it at all.

Clinton's decision to accept paid speeches as late as March of next year is sending the message to leading Democratic operatives that a possible campaign announcement may not come until next spring. And as Clinton delays the seemingly inevitable decision, she's receiving surprisingly little blowback from Democratic activists who usually are spoiling for intra-party competition.

Democratic operatives in both Iowa and New Hampshire say that Clinton's high national name ID, residual support, and organization from 2008 along with the efforts of the pro-Clinton group Ready for Hillary mean there's really no downside to the former secretary of State taking as much time as she needs before entering the 2016 race.

"Hillary Clinton is going to do what Hillary Clinton is going to do, and everyone is just going to react to it when that happens," said Norm Sterzenbach, an Iowa Democratic strategist. "She could get in at almost any time over the next six to seven months and would still be the front-runner.… I don't think it really changes much for her."

Earlier this week, Clinton accepted an invitation to speak to the New York and New Jersey chapter of the American Camp Association on March 19, which has led to speculation that any campaign announcement won't come until late March. She also has scheduled paid speeches for Jan. 21 in Canada and Feb. 24 in the San Francisco Bay Area.

For Clinton's eventual campaign, the benefits of a later announcement are obvious: If she isn't a candidate, it's harder for people to treat her like one—and easier for her to not answer specific policy questions she'd rather avoid. Earlier this month, she gave the keynote address at the League of Conservation Voters dinner in New York without discussing whether she supports the construction of the Keystone XL pipeline.

The earlier she gets in, of course, the earlier her supporters can begin organizing in an official way—and nowhere is that more important than in the first-in-the-nation Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire primary. These states are used to starting early, and many supporters are itching to start mobilizing for a Clinton campaign.

But in the meantime, the Ready for Hillary super PAC fills that void—and has been giving Clinton backers a place to go since 2013. Supporters of Clinton say the group has helped keep potential Clinton backers engaged and involved—and kept them from looking elsewhere in the time before Clinton's decision is announced.

"Ready for Hillary has helped give Secretary Clinton the luxury of time," said Jerry Crawford, a longtime Clinton supporter who advises Ready for Hillary. "It has kept some of the pressure off in terms of moving quickly into campaign mode."

The group sent more than two dozen staffers to key midterm states, including Iowa and New Hampshire, earlier this fall. It has had advisers and volunteers in key presidential states for more than a year, who have been holding house parties and organizational events to bring more people on board. As a result, the group has signed up "tens of thousands" of supporters in Iowa alone.

"I think people would be getting antsy now if there were no Ready for Hillary," said Terry Shumaker, another longtime Clinton backer who advises the group in New Hampshire. "[Even in 2013] there was this pent-up desire, in New Hampshire particularly, where the Clintons have many supporters, to do something to encourage her to run. Ready for Hillary has been able to channel that energy in a very positive way."

Should Clinton choose a later announcement, she'd be helped by the fact that presidential campaign activity in both parties seems to be holding off until at least early next year. With the exception of Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia, who formed an exploratory committee last month, no 2016 hopeful has made formal moves to enter the race yet—and some even say it will be late spring or summer before they do anything official.

That said, the idea of a spring announcement from Clinton does scramble the typical calculus for candidates in these states, some operatives said. In Iowa, for example, prospective candidates usually start forming exploratory committees on the January before the caucuses, staffing up in the state and making trips out.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At this point, several Democrats have made pilgrimages to Iowa and New Hampshire; however, the only Democrat who has logged regular trips to the early states and begun doing the legwork for a bid is Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley. Still, the absence of additional intra-party competition—which Clinton faced in 2008 with the early entrance of Barack Obama into the race—gives Clinton more room to take her time.

Crawford said that exhaustion from a particularly tough midterm year in Iowa has many of its Democratic operatives and activists thankful this cycle's presidential prospects are taking things slow. Iowa, he said, has "just endured a grueling and depressing U.S. Senate race"—a reference to Democrat Bruce Braley's 9-point loss to GOP state Sen. Joni Ernst—and its political class is grateful for the time off before presidential season begins in earnest.

Activists and observers give varying timelines for when people will start to wonder whether Clinton not running after all—some say once April begins, while others named May 1. But most expect that the answer will come before then, especially if it's a "no."

"If somebody is waiting for an announcement from Mrs. Clinton, then that person is probably prepared to wait not only through December and January but also through February and March," said Kurt Meyer, who chairs Iowa's Mitchell County Democratic Party. "She need not declare for our sakes."

Jim Davis, a 2008 supporter of Clinton and longtime Democratic activist who's backing her again, said he's willing to wait.

"From my standpoint, until she makes it clear one way or another, I'm not going anywhere," he said.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Hillary Clinton: Why Wait to Announce 2016 Bid?"

By Peter Nicholas

December 12, 2014, 6:16 a.m. EST

She is giving speeches at a dizzying clip. Popping up at the White House to chat with President Barack Obama. Schmoozing with Prince William and his wife, Kate, during the royal couple's recent trip to New York.

It all suggests a Hillary Clinton presidential bid is under way.

Only there's no candidate.

Mrs. Clinton hasn't announced she is running. And it's now looking as if she could wait until spring before she officially jumps into the 2016 presidential race. The last time she ran, she declared in January of 2007. Were she to stick to the same timetable, she'd tell us of her plans next month.

Why wait? After all, most people already seem convinced she's running, and Mrs. Clinton has done little to discourage the idea.

Let's look at both sides of the argument.

Three reasons it might be in her interest to delay an announcement:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

–Self-interest. Once she declares, she's on the hook to release a personal financial disclosure form. That will provide fresh fodder for critics who believe former President Bill Clinton and Mrs. Clinton have entered the ranks of the super-rich, propelled by six-figure speaking fees. There's a palpable strain of populism in the Democratic Party, personified by Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.). A spotlight on the Clintons' personal wealth could stir up the left, stoking calls for a primary challenge from Ms. Warren.

–Money. Some Democrats have complained that donors won't commit to candidates not named Hillary Clinton while she's a potential candidate. She's effectively frozen the Democratic field. By keeping people guessing, Mrs. Clinton starves potential primary opponents of the campaign money they need to begin a credible presidential bid.

–Convenience. Mrs. Clinton is the runaway front-runner for the Democratic nomination. She has a campaign apparatus waiting. No other prospective candidate in either party comes to the race with such built-in advantages. Meantime, she can counter any Republican attacks by saying she's not even a candidate. And she can continue making money through paid speeches, such as one coming up in March to a summer camp conference in Atlantic City.

Three reasons to announce now:

–Party loyalty. Democrats are at a crossroads, following their disastrous showing in the midterm elections last month. The party is divided between Warren-style liberals and pragmatic centrists. Fissures have developed between Mr. Obama and Democratic congressional leaders. House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California said Thursday she was "enormously disappointed" the White House agreed to a $1.1 trillion spending bill that would roll back language in the Dodd-Frank law regulating financial institutions. Mrs. Clinton, once she enters the race, would be the party's instant standard-bearer and could help bridge divisions.

–Control. Many Democrats aren't waiting for Mrs. Clinton; they're starting her campaign with or without her. That's not necessarily in her interest. Last week, an enterprising super PAC in California went so far as to release a music video that has the feel of a Clinton campaign theme song. Was the video a ham-handed plea for the white male working class vote? Or an inspired attempt to broaden the appeal of a woman determined to break the ultimate glass ceiling? You be the judge.

In any case, the video went viral. If a Clinton campaign were up and running, there would be less attention paid to freelance efforts and more focus on the ideas coming from the actual candidate. Mrs. Clinton would be better positioned to control the messages coming out under her name.

–Reality. Is there really any doubt that Mrs. Clinton is dead-set on running? If not, why put off the inevitable? Why not get it over with and announce after the holidays? "I'm baaaack," Mrs. Clinton said in September at a Democratic fundraising event in Iowa, the state that hosts the first-in-the-nation nominating contest. She's back. So … get in.

[Subtitle:] The Democratic Party's losses at the state level are almost unprecedented, and could cripple it for a long time to come.

The most immediate consequence of the Democrats' midterm disaster was losing control of the Senate and ceding Congress to the GOP. For the next two years, Democrats will have to deal with conservative legislation, right-wing hijinks, and—in all odds—a vacancy crisis, as Republicans freeze confirmations and refuse to fill spots in the executive branch and on the federal bench.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That is bad for the Democratic Party. What's on the horizon is worse. As Amy Walter notes for the Cook Political Report, Democrats lost big at all levels of government, including the states. "Today," she writes, "about 55 percent of all state legislative seats in the country are held by Republicans. That's the largest share of GOP state legislators since the 1920s." What's more, "just 11 states have an all Democratic-controlled legislature," and Democrats hold single-party control in just seven states. By contrast, "Republicans have a legislative majority in 30 states, including the battleground states of Florida, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and North Carolina," and single-party control in most of the South.

This, Walter says, is a slow-moving disaster for congressional Democrats. She's right. Absent major gains in 2016, 2018, and 2020, Democrats will be shut out of the next round of redistricting. If, she writes, "Democrats can't get a seat at the redistricting table in 2020, they may find themselves locked out of a congressional majority for another 10 years." And even if they do get a seat at the table, argues Greg Sargent for the Washington Post, there's still the problem of population distribution; even in blue states, most Democratic voters are crammed in a handful of urban areas, which dilutes their strength in House elections. Sargent quotes David Wasserman (also of the Cook Political Report): "If Democrats were to get neutral maps drawn by God in all 50 states, they would still fall well short of winning back the House," says Wasserman. "What Democrats really need is a massive resettlement program."

With that said, there are more costs to Democratic weakness in the states than just House elections. States are where parties build talent and try new ideas. Here, the GOPis instructive. Its brightest stars are either governors (Scott Walker, John Kasich, and Chris Christie) or former state officeholders (Marco Rubio, Ted Cruz, and Joni Ernst). And Republican-controlled statehouses have been incubators for conservative ideas, from experiments in tax cutting (Bobby Jindal's Louisiana and Sam Brownback's Kansas) to full-fledged assaults on public-sector unions (Walker's Wisconsin and Christie's New Jersey). In all likelihood, the next Republican president will either come from the states, or will borrow his approach from the present generation of GOP governors. Likewise, if Democrats win the White House for a third term, they'll face opposition from Congress and empowered Republican majorities at the state level. Indeed, if not for statehouse Republicans, the Affordable Care Act would be a smoother project, with broader buy-in for exchanges and the Medicaid expansion.

Democrats might have strong national prospects in the form of Hillary Clinton, but they have little to look to in the states. Only a few places stand as incubators for progressive strategies and ideas, and nationwide, Democrats have close to nothing in the way of a bench for federal and statewide office. The liberal counterparts to Walker, Christie, Brownback, and Mike Pence—ideologically motivated governors with national profiles—don't exist. And as a result, liberals can't point to a forward-looking agenda that exists outside the bounds of the presidency.

Worse, without a strong presence in the states, liberals lack a base for institutional pressure. Outside of Congress, there are few party voices pushing President Obama to the left, or urging a more liberal approach to key policy matters. And while part of this is just the nature of the game—parties try to maintain unity when they control the White House—part of it has to do with the lack of strong liberal voices (and strong liberal agendas) throughout the country. If you have your doubts, you just have to look at the field of presidential candidates for the 2016 Democratic primary who aren't Clinton. At most—for viable, liberal alternatives outside of Congress—there's outgoing Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley. The rest are either sitting senators or moderate governors, like New York's Andrew Cuomo.

Put simply, the two statewide Republican waves have put Democrats and liberals on the near-term defensive. The former will struggle to build a new bench for the post-Obama era, and the latter will fight to put effective pressure on a national party that—if it follows the lead of its likely nominee—isn't eager to embrace the unapologetic liberalism of its activist class. And the honest truth is that things could get worse. With a sudden economic downturn, Democrats could enter 2016 as serious underdogs, giving Republicans a real chance to elevate new talent and give their statewide strategies a spin on the national stage.

CNN: "Torture report splits 2016 Democrats"

By Dan Merica

December 11, 2014, 4:07 p.m. EST

The release of the CIA torture report on Tuesday, detailing brutal post-9/11 interrogation tactics, has led to an array of responses from potential 2016 Democratic presidential candidates.

Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, in an interview with The New York Times released Thursday, moved to the left of former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton when he called for a "special prosecutor" from the Justice Department to look into those who carried out the torture.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I think there needs to be some accountability so that this doesn't happen again," O'Malley said. "I don't believe the United States should torture. Period. Full stop."

All Democrats eying the presidency are against torture, but so far O'Malley is the only to advocate for a Justice Department investigation.

Clinton, during her time of the speaking circuit, has advocated for the release of the torture report but not a special prosecutor.

"I thought we needed more transparency," Clinton said at a June event, reflecting on her time as secretary of state. "I didn't want people to be criminally prosecuted, people who were doing what they were told to do, that there were legal opinions supporting what they were told to do, but I wanted transparency."

She added, "And that's what Dianne Feinstein is trying to provide with that 6,000-page report. And I think the American people deserve to see it."

A Clinton spokesman has not responded to emails asking for comment after the release of the report.

Independent Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders issued a statement on Tuesday after the torture report was released.

"The United States must not engage in torture," Sanders said. "If we do, in an increasingly brutal world, we lose our moral standing to condemn other nations or groups that engage in uncivilized behavior."

Sanders, however, did not comment on a special prosecutor and his spokesman was unable to provide a statement on Thursday from the senator.

In a conversation with reporters on Wednesday, Sanders did, however, say that if anyone lied to elected official on torture, "they should be fired immediately."

And former Sen. Jim Webb, the only Democrat who has announced an exploratory committee into the 2016 race, questioned why lawmakers didn't provide better oversight of the program.

"The policies that allowed or turned a blind eye to these acts are no longer in place. The question is whether the intelligence committees are properly conducting oversight functions today," he said in a statement.

Webb also sent a number of tweets about the torture report that seemed to cast doubt on why Congress was looking into the matter now.

"Where was the Intelligence Committee when the torture was going on," question Webb in one tweet.

"The question is not torture, but how far Congress has descended in its historical oversight role on key issues of foreign policy," he said in another.

Politico: “Bill Clinton: Let’s push for more info on CIA torture”

Former President Bill Clinton is backing the release of a report documenting the CIA's use of torture after the Sept. 11 attacks, saying the country should "keep pushing" to find out more about what happened.

In an interview Thursday with Fusion's Jorge Ramos, Clinton also rebutted critics' claims that the report's release by the Senate Intelligence Committee will spark reactions that could endanger Americans.

"What I hope will happen is that we will keep pushing on this, find out exactly what happened, give anybody who disagrees a chance to have their say, and then do what we should always do in cases like this — say what our policy is going to be on this and stick with it and have it consistent with international law," Clinton said. "I do not think we are in more danger because of this."

The Democratic former president added that the release of the report showed that "we believe, instead of putting these problems under the rug and hiding them, it's better to come out and say, 'OK, this is what happened, now let's talk about how we can fix it, how we can make it better.'"

Clinton also declined to fault former President George W. Bush, who was in office at the time the CIA was using the harsh tactics on terrorist suspects.

Clinton's wife, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton — a likely Democratic presidential contender in 2016 — has yet to publicly weigh in on the report and its release. Hillary Clinton served in the Senate during Bush's presidency.

Bloomberg: "Welcome to the Democrats' Post-Obama Family Feud"

By Lisa Lerer

December 12, 2014, 5:45 a.m. EST

[Subtitle:] The Progressive movement is in search of a leader and a voice to pressure Hillary Clinton to embrace populist economic issues.

It's turning out to be an awkward week for the Dean family. As former Vermont Governor Howard Dean announced Wednesday that he would back a Hillary Clinton presidential bid, the progressive group he founded declared that they were launching a major campaign to coax Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren into the race.

"Some of the other candidates may not be happy about this but they'll thank us for it later," Jim Dean, executive director of Democracy for America, and Howard's brother, said of the effort to woo Warren. "Part of this is trying to wake the party up." His position couldn't be more different than his brother's, who praised Clinton as a "mature, seasoned, thoughtful leader" in an editorial published by Politico that morning.

As the Jims of the Democratic world are clamoring for an alternative to Clinton, the Howards are racing to line up behind her even though she hasn't decided whether to run. The two powerful women at the center of the discontent, however, are little more than indicators of a far broader family feud over the Democratic party's future heading into 2016. On one side of the debate are strategists and officials, including some aligned with Clinton, who believe their path to the White House in the post-Obama era rests with wooing centrist, working class voters. To progressive activists, union members, and other parts of the "professional left," as an Obama aide once called them, victory lies in running on an aggressive, populist economic message.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Some of the jockeying now is trying to strategically make sure Hillary understands that she can't be an economic moderate without generating pushback," said Andy Stern, the former head of the Service Employees International Union. "Progressives are anxious that her policies, not her heart, will be too generous toward Wall Street."

That debate will take center stage this weekend, when liberal activists gather in Washington for RootsCamp, an annual "unconference" that brings thousands of progressives to the Washington Convention Center. A major topic in the hallways will be the announcement by liberal groups this week of plans to spend more than a million dollars, including opening offices in the early primary states of Iowa and New Hampshire, trying to convince beloved economic populist Warren to challenge Clinton. Despite Warren's insistent refrain that she is not running for president, activists see a glimmer of hope. "She's been very consistent in her statements saying she is not running present tense," said Neil Sroka, a spokesman for Democracy for America. "Tense matters."

For now, though, progressives are a movement in search of a leader. With Clinton's take-over of the Democratic party near complete, there's no national figure willing to take up their cry. Other than Warren, former Wisconsin Senator Russ Feingold, known for his principled stances against big money in politics, has a government job already—working for the State Department that Clinton used to run. Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley's political clout was weakened by the midterm loss of his lieutenant governor in the race to succeed him and the governor has pulled staff out of Iowa. Even Al Sharpton, who hammered Clinton for taking weeks to comments on the racially-charged riots in Ferguson, Missouri, put out a press release to brag about his birthday call from Clinton.

Of course, Clinton could decide not to run, Warren could change her mind, or any number of unpredictable events that tend to scramble presidential races could upend the Democratic field. But, so far, there's little sign that many Democrats are thirsting for a Clinton alternative. In Iowa, for instance, she is the top candidate for 53 percent of likely Democratic caucusgoers, according to a Bloomberg Politics/Des Moines Register poll. That's roughly five times bigger than Warren, who followed with 10 percent support as a first pick of party insiders. Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders, and independent, and former Virginia Senator Jim Webb, who've expressed interest in running, trailed behind at three and one percent, respectively. "If she chooses to run, and I hope she does, I think she will have no significant opposition," said Ted Strickland, the former Ohio Governor who now heads the Center for American Progress Action Fund, the advocacy arm of a liberal think tank. "I'm not saying there won't be a primary contest but I don't see any reasonable possibility that she could be denied the Democratic nomination."

Strickland, along with other Clinton-backers, sees commercial motives in the Draft Warren effort. "If someone has said they are not a candidate for president, period, is it respectful or disrespectful to use that person's name for their own purposes?" asked Des Moines lawyer Jerry Crawford, who co-chaired Clinton's 2008 campaign in Iowa and helps lead Ready for Hillary, a group laying the groundwork for a campaign, in the state. "If Secretary Clinton said she wasn't running, I wouldn't be out there disrespecting her by engaging in a draft movement."

Unlike the Tea Party, which remains a powerful force in the Republican party, the influence of progressive groups has waned during the Obama years. With the Senate soon to be in Republican control, progressives aspire to become their own power center that can force Democrats to stand strong on economic issues. By aligning themselves with Warren, who's an outspoken advocate of Wall Street regulation, groups like MoveOn not only grow membership lists and bank accounts, they also raise their profile. "Could there be some self-serving motives behind this? Of course," said Strickland. "If you're not engaged in some kind of specific effort, it's a little more difficult to keep support coming in."

While Warren is their billboard, the real target is likely Clinton. A history of pro-business economic policies and a roster of rich Wall Street donors make progressive and union activists anxious about the direction of her leadership and political loyalties. Though she has yet to announce a campaign, they're trying to send the message that their concerns should not be taken for granted. "I think the fact that people are encouraging a person who probably isn't going to run may just be a manifestation of wanting to make clear that Secretary Clinton is not going to walk in and assume there's a coronation," said Stern. "She's going to have to work it policy-wise, particularly on the economy"

That's no surprise, given that most Democrats have already turned their attention to Clinton. Operatives are jockeying for jobs. Donors are eager to open their wallets. And politicians are rushing to position themselves for a campaign that doesn't yet exist. Why should her progressive opposition be any different?

National Journal: "Elizabeth Warren: The GOP's New Favorite Foil"

By Sarah Mimms

December 11, 2014

With congressional compromises collapsing all around them and facing a pending government shutdown, Republicans are testing a new message: Blame it all on Elizabeth Warren.

In less than 24 hours this week, two bicameral deals over must-pass legislation appeared near collapse. Congress needs to extend federal funding if it wants to keep the government running, and it is also facing the expiration of a terrorism insurance program that lawmakers from both parties are set on extending. But both deals hit turmoil in their final hours, in part over planned additions to the legislative packages that would pull back parts of the Dodd-Frank Wall Street regulation law.

As stalemates loom, Republicans aren't putting blame for the impasse on Harry Reid, or on Nancy Pelosi, or even on President Obama. They're targeting Warren: One Republican aide griped anonymously to Politico that if the deals collapsed, it was because of Warren's influence over the rest of the party.

How much power the Massachusetts Democrat has over negotiations, however, is an open question. Staffers on both sides of the aisle involved in the discussions over the omnibus spending bill and Terrorism Risk Insurance Act (TRIA) say Warren was not party to any of those talks. Instead, Sens. Barbara Mikulski and Chuck Schumer lead those negotiations, respectively. And given Warren's frantic reaction to the provisions when they became public this week, it appears she was just as shocked by last-minute changes to Dodd-Frank as everyone else.

Republicans say Warren is responsible nonetheless. "Being present in the room is not necessary to have your presence felt," Republican National Committee spokesman Sean Spicer explained. "Every leading Democrat feels like Elizabeth Warren is looking over their shoulder to go further to the left."

The swiftness with which Republicans blamed Warren signals that they see her as both a threat and an easy target. And as Warren's star rises within the Democratic Party, it's a tactic that promises to see much more airtime.

Warren was recently named to Democratic leadership (she won't actually take her seat in soon-to-be Minority Leader Reid's office until January) and while she's repeatedly said whe won't run for president, she's often mentioned as a potential contender in the race—though not unless Hillary Clinton takes a pass. But she has no committee chairmanships and, for now, little real power in the Senate. Warren is the least-senior senior senator in Congress, having served for less than two years.

Republicans see Warren as a way to paint the Democratic Party as increasingly beholden to its liberal wing and removed from moderates. (Democrats take the same tact with Republican Sen. Ted Cruz, often referring to the Texan as "Speaker Cruz" to imply that his wishes hold sway in the House.)

Warren is hardly the only Dodd-Frank champion among congressional Democrats. And she's far from alone in opposing the changes pushed by Republicans this week. Liberal icons like Sen. Sherrod Brown and even Wall Street-aligned Democrats like Schumer oppose the Dodd-Frank reforms. "It's not unique to her," one senior Democratic aide said, adding that many Democrats see using the deals to reopen Dodd-Frank as a nonstarter. "I don't think her being outspoken on it has made other people outspoken."

But other members of the Democratic Conference in the Senate aren't seen as rising stars the way Warren is. Few are considered potential presidential candidates. And none serves as well in the role of liberal specter over the next two years as Warren will, particularly now that she is a member of leadership. "The more exposure she gets, the better for us," Spicer said. Warren could easily become a poster-woman for the Democratic Party over the next two years, he argued, serving the same purpose as Pelosi and Reid have in Republican advertising and strategy.

Of course, Warren isn't as well known as Pelosi or Reid—and certainly not Hillary Clinton—and the Republican focus on her will only serve to increase her national profile, as she contemplates moving up in the political sphere. But Republicans argue that Warren's popularity is limited to a specific constituency; sure, she could do well among Democrats, but she'd have a hard time appealing to the center. In highlighting her, Republicans are betting that the negatives will outweigh the positives.

"You're building them up, but in the process of building them up you're making them so unviable," Spicer said. "If you told me today that Hillary Clinton had announced that she isn't running [for president] and Elizabeth Warren is, I would be doing the biggest jig in my office."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the senior Democratic aide simply pointed to the 2014 elections, when Warren traveled the country on behalf of Democratic candidates, drawing huge crowds. "Look at how many people show up when she goes and campaigns, even in red states," the aide said. "She has the pulse of what people are anxious about ... that there's a system that is working against growing wages and better-paying jobs. And that's exactly why people are crying out for. And that's why she resonates in Massachusetts, that's why she gets invited to places like West Virginia, Kentucky. She has a message for all audiences. It's a universal message."

Republicans plan to use that very message against Warren. Republican pollster David Winston notes that in 2008, exit polls showed that Americans felt that government should do more by an 8-point margin. In the wake of the 2014 midterm elections, that number flipped significantly; Americans now prefer that government do less by a 13-point margin.

"[Warren's] whole focus is government being the solution. What she's saying and what the public is saying are two different things," Winston said.

Democrats disagree. In a speech last month at the National Press Club, Schumer mounted a strong defense of a pro-government Democratic Party, pointing to Gallup polling that has shown that about a third of Americans prefer a more active government, a third prefer less government intervention, and a third want something in the middle. Those numbers have hardly changed since 2010. Warren, who will work under Schumer when she joins the leadership team, is a key part of spreading that message.

Warren's promotion to leadership only reinforces the idea that she speaks for the party as a whole, Winston and Spicer said. And as she gains influence within the conference, they say, it only helps Republicans. "I understand why Harry Reid and Democrats put her in leadership, but I wouldn't be surprised if a year or more from now they regret that," Spicer said.

But Warren's influence isn't limited to just the Senate. Pelosi forwarded a copy of Warren's entire floor speech on her objections to the Dodd-Frank provision in the omnibus to reporters Wednesday. And the grassroots effort lead by MoveOn.Org, Ready for Warren, and other liberal groups to draft Warren to run for president is only raising her profile even higher.

Warren is hardly walking away from that position. She spoke at length on the Senate floor Wednesday, saying she would vote against the omnibus spending bill that will keep the government's doors open over the Dodd-Frank provision. She has worked tirelessly over the past few days to unite Democrats in the House and Senate around the issue, even holding a press conference with colleagues in the House urging Democrats in the lower chamber to pull their support from the bill until the Dodd-Frank language is removed.

And House Democrats did just that, forcing Republican leadership to pull the omnibus at the last minute and huddle with their members over how to pass the bill with just hours remaining before a scheduled government shutdown.

Warren wasn't alone in her opposition to the Dodd-Frank changes, but she was among the most vocal. For Republicans, that's good enough.

Boston Globe: "Mass. group hopes to give Clinton a headstart"

By David Scharfenberg

December 12, 2014

Hillary Rodham Clinton has not yet declared for president. But more than a few politicos are working to build the scaffolding for her campaign.

Ready for Hillary and Priorities USA Action, super PACs stacked with high-profile supporters, have grabbed headlines. But several other, smaller groups have sprouted, too.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There's Faith Voters for Hillary. There's Hillarypac (and its mortal enemy, Stop Hillary PAC). Another committee, Stand for Hillary, recently deployed a singing cowboy in an online video.

Now, a new entrant from Massachusetts: Sign for Hillary.

The online venture, which went live Thursday afternoon, has a very specific mission: giving Clinton a headstart on the laborious process of collecting signatures to get on the ballot in Democratic primaries all over the country.

The signforhillary.com approach is pretty simple.

Step one: Get Clinton supporters to commit in advance to signing a petition in the 20 states that require or allow candidates to collect signatures (17 states require them, according to Sign for Hillary's count, while three others allow candidates to compile them in lieu of paying a filing fee to get on the ballot). Step two: If and when Clinton formally declares, send out the nomination papers to be signed and mailed back.

"I've never seen it done anywhere," said Harold Hubschman, a Sign for Hillary cofounder who owns a professional signature-collecting firm. "And I've been looking."

The states that require signatures (Massachusetts is not one of them) ask for relatively few. In Alabama, it's 500. In Virginia, it's 5,000.

But there are some tricky provisions. Several states, for instance, require a certain number of signatures from each of their congressional districts. And quite a few mainstream presidential candidates have failed to make a primary ballot for one reason or another.

In 2012, Republicans Newt Gingrich, Rick Santorum, Rick Perry, and Jon Hunstman Jr. all failed to qualify in Virginia. Perry campaign officials testified in court that an employee of a firm the campaign hired to collect signatures came up short after falling into a diabetic coma.

Sign for Hillary organizers, who hope to collect 100,000 signatures, say they're sure Clinton's political machine would be up to the task. But they figure there's no harm in giving the nascent campaign a headstart. And they say the effort, if successful, will free up Clinton campaign volunteers to do other work.

Arline Isaacson, a veteran lobbyist and gay rights advocate involved with Sign for Hillary, adds that the project — which advisers plan to hand over to the Clinton campaign if she declares — will be collecting names and addresses that could be of value for fund-raising and other purposes.

"We're not just getting any Tom, Dick, and Harry to sign a petition, which is what you do in most states — you stand out there with a clipboard and you get anyone who's willing to come along and sign a paper," she said. "Everyone signing this is a genuine, bonafide, card-carrying Hillary supporter."

Hubschman said he and Sign for Hillary cofounder James E. Fleming, another veteran political operative, had long been kicking around the idea of a Web-driven effort to identify petition signers in advance. And the expected Clinton campaign, he said, seemed like the perfect place to start.

The former senator and secretary of state, he said, "is a force of nature right now in Democratic politics" and her potential candidacy provided a good opportunity "to go viral."

Richard Goldstein, legal counsel for Sign for Hillary, said there is nothing in the law to prevent Clinton from absorbing the group or designating it an official affiliated committee if she declares. But any donations individuals make to Sign for Hillary would count against the maximum they can give to Clinton herself.

Sign for Hillary officials are capping donations at $99, so as not to compete with a possible Clinton campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hubschman said he hopes the Clinton campaign will let Sign for Hillary continue to run the operation if she declares. But he insisted he's not angling for any paid work with the campaign. He said he simply believes that Clinton would make a great president.

Politico: "Backers: Romney more open to 2016 run"

By Ben White and Maggie Haberman

December 11, 2014, 6:25 p.m. EST

For most of the past year, Mitt Romney supporters have publicly said he should consider running again. And for most of the past year, Romney has seemed uninterested.

Until recently.

While some people close to Romney insist he hasn't moved from saying he has no plans to run, the 2012 Republican nominee has sounded at least open to the idea in recent conversations, according to more than a dozen people who've spoken with him in the last month.

In his private musings, Romney has sounded less than upbeat about most of the potential candidates in the 2016 Republican field, according to the people who've spoken with him, all of whom asked for anonymity in order to speak freely.

He has assessed various people's strengths and weaknesses dispassionately, wearing what one ally called his "consultant cap" to measure the field. He has said, among other things, that Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor, would run into problems because of his business dealings, his work with the investment banks Lehman Brothers and Barclays, and his private equity investments.

"You saw what they did to me with Bain [Capital]," he has said, referring to the devastating attacks that his Republican rivals and President Obama's team launched against him for his time in private equity, according to three sources familiar with the line. "What do you think they'll do to [Bush] over Barclays?"

Romney did not respond to a request for comment left with his son's firm, Solemere Capital, where the former Massachusetts governor serves as an adviser. Spencer Zwick, finance chair of Romney's 2012 campaign chairman and now a senior executive at Solamere, declined to comment on any discussions Romney may have had with investors or anyone else about 2016.

"I'd very much like him to run and think he would make a great president and a lot of people who supported him in 2012 and even those who did not support him want him to run," Zwick said. "That doesn't mean he will run."

For most of the past year, even Republicans who admire Romney have believed the chatter about him possibly running for president has been mostly sparked by his former staffers or people involved with Solemere, seeing it as a boon for business.

Romney's new tone in discussions with people behind closed doors came as Bush has seemed to move closer toward a run. A number of donors and operatives who had assumed Bush would take a pass now believe he is likely to enter the race.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

People close to Romney stressed that he has deep respect for Bush.

“He thinks Gov. Bush was a good governor,” said one source close to Romney, who added that the former Massachusetts governor has still maintained he has no plans to run. However, the source added, there is a “growing chorus” of people who would like to see him do it again.

“There’s a core group of people around Mitt who think he should take another stab at it,” said the source. That has grown to include some former donors, who have told other candidates that they are waiting to see what Romney does. With a crowded GOP field expected to take shape, the stance also buys donors time to decide on a candidate.

Those people say Romney has felt vindicated by many of the events of the past two years, such as Russia’s incursion into Ukraine.

Most Republicans still doubt that Romney would subject himself to a third grueling national run. They believe he is basking in the praise of his supporters, after the sharp disappoint of his 2012 loss, for which he was vilified by some Republicans at the time. He was widely seen as running a feckless campaign, marked by overcaution and the questionable strategy of making his business record a centerpiece of his bid.

But top Wall Street executives who met with Romney on his recent trip to New York said they came away from the sit-downs – which mostly focused on Solemere, his son Tagg’s Solamere investment firm – more convinced the 2012 nominee was thinking about another run.

“I came away from the conversation with the distinct impression that he was running and that he did not think anyone in the field right now was particularly strong,” said one top executive who met with Romney and requested not to be identified while speaking about a private conversation.

“It sounded like he felt he could win, and that the country had turned in his direction and he looks at the field and does not see anyone who does not look very beatable,” said the executive.

This executive and another who met with Romney said they were struck by the former Massachusetts governor’s comments about Bush, who is also strongly considering a run. These executives said Romney indicated that he would not defer to Bush as the standard-bearer of the establishment wing of the Republican Party.

They also said Romney indicated that Bush would run into even more issues about his business dealings than Romney did over his private equity fortune in 2012. Bush’s latest investment funds, according to a Bloomberg Businessweek story published Thursday, include offshore tax havens and Chinese investors — an indication they would be an ongoing focus if the former Florida governor enters the race. (A Bush aide said in an email that “there are no offshore tax havens” and called the story’s conclusion “a huge and inappropriate leap.”)

As for Romney, he “tells people not to commit to a candidate that is not their first choice and that they aren’t excited about,” said the second executive, who was involved in the meetings. “He does not think much of the current field and does not think it is jelling. He still views himself as the leader of the establishment wing of the Republican Party. He does not feel he owes the Bushes anything and does not think Jeb is the de facto leader of the establishment GOP.”

Among the people Romney has spoken with recently is casino magnate Sheldon Adelson, according to three people familiar with the encounter. Adelson single-handedly kept Newt Gingrich alive against Romney in the 2012 GOP primary through a super PAC, before giving $30 million to a pro-Romney group after he clinched the nomination.

Another person close to Romney said that the former governor’s “body language” is different now and he is “certainly taking a harder look” at getting in the 2016 race. Still, one Romney supporter cautioned that people who want him to run sometimes hear what they want to hear in the former governor’s comments.

Nonetheless, several people have noticed a change in tone, which comes after Romney previously indicated to people that he would only get into the race under an extreme circumstance in which party leaders drafted him during an inconclusive primary process.

“In September he said to me that he’s run twice and now it’s other people’s turn,” said Bobbie Kilberg, a GOP fund-raiser in Virginia who is hoping

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

People who believe Romney has shifted in his thinking said they are unclear about whether he would attempt to run regardless of the field, or whether he would wait to see how Bush and other candidates fare.

Another top Republican operative who is supportive of a Jeb Bush candidacy said that he did not believe Bush would have as much trouble with his financial dealings in a campaign as Romney did.

“Jeb’s wealth and investments are nothing on the scale of Romney’s. He is not building car elevators,” this person said, offering a hint of the bitterness that could ensue if both Romney and Bush run.

Indeed, Bush, for his part, has begun conducting opposition research on himself to identify any potential issues that could arise, a standard move for potential candidates but nonetheless one that indicates his level of seriousness about the process, two people familiar with his plans said.

He has also had discussions about how he would get out of his business ventures. Indeed, one Bush supporter said the former Florida governor would be far more proactive than Romney was in responding to attacks about his business record, which Romney made central to his run.

There will be “no fetal position” from Bush, said the source, a reference to Romney’s decision to wait until he had been defined by Democrats to start hitting back and defining himself.

Politico: “Ex-Obama aide makes Warren-2016 push”

By Maggie Haberman

December 11, 2014, 10:19 p.m. EST

A former campaign aide to President Barack Obama who is volunteering with a super PAC trying to draft Democrat Elizabeth Warren to run for president says he’s gathered “in the hundreds” of signatures from fellow Obama alumni to prod the Massachusetts senator into the race.

The onetime aide, Christopher Hass, has circulated the letter on an Obama alumni email group and said it will be released on Friday.

The letter comes after the progressive group MoveOn.org announced this week it is spending $1 million to try to draft Warren into the race and challenge likely candidate Hillary Clinton. Ready for Warren, the draft effort, has struggled to raise money after disavowed them publicly. The first-term senator has said repeatedly she will not run for president.

“Some of you may have already seen this passed around by other Obama folks over the past few days, but I wanted to make sure as many fellow OFA alumni as possible had a chance to see and take part,” Hass, who recently served as digital director for Illinois Gov. Pat Quinn’s failed reelection bid, wrote on the email list. “Later this week, a public letter is going to be released with the names of former OFA staffers who are urging Elizabeth Warren to run for president.”

He added: “This is born out of a lot of things — not just affection for Warren (though there’s plenty of that) but also the desire for there to be a real, competitive primary in 2016 that will make our party, our eventual candidate, and our country stronger. I’ve seen the list of signers, and there’s a lot of great people on it. If you want to add your name, today is your last chance.”

"We helped elect Barack Obama — now we're calling on Elizabeth Warren to run in 2016," Hass' letter states. "We know that the improbable is far from impossible."

The letter states that former Obama campaign staffers and Organizing for America aides are making the pro-Warren push.

"Rising income inequality is the challenge of our times, and we want someone who will stand up for working families and take on the Wall Street banks and special interests that took down our economy," the letter says.

Just after the burst of activity around Warren this week, former presidential hopeful Howard Dean wrote an op-ed in POLITICO explaining why he is supporting Clinton. The pro-Warren moves were made by a group he founded, Democracy for America. But Dean wrote that he expects Clinton to talk about income inequality and the middle class if she runs.

The various groups' efforts to lure Warren into the race, as improbable as their success may be, serve an additional purpose — boosting their own fundraising and email lists.

Some Obama allies have seen Warren as the person likeliest to run a campaign using his 2008 formula. But Obama had crossover appeal with Democratic voters that Warren does not, and he had made clear by this point in 2006 that he was seriously considering launching a campaign. By contrast, Warren signed a letter with other Democratic women senators urging Clinton to run.

FYI--not sure where the AV groups are on this.

Here comes one more 527

Numerous political activists and consultants are quietly establishing campaign organizations these days with the goal of influencing the 2008 presidential campaign.

It's tough to tell which will actually develop and have any impact on the race. But The Times' Dan Morain, who monitors campaign finances, has come upon documents for voters to keep their eye on.

It's the American Alliance for Energy Independence.

Given the events in Washington this week, a practiced eye might assume that the United States' energy future is likely to be an issue in the 2008 general election campaign. Congress approved and the president signed one bill increasing gas mileage requirements for all vehicles, and a second measure to grant loan guarantees to power companies that might seek to build new nuclear power plants.

And the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency blocked California's effort to curb greenhouse gases.

While energy has received passing attention in the presidential campaign, two Democratic politicos are convinced that given the stakes, the issue needs a tad more attention. Hence, they took out papers recently to create American Alliance, a 527, so named for the revenue code section that defines rules governing such independent political organizations.

Both organizers come by way of former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who had a short-lived presidential candidacy and sought to make energy a key issue before dropping out and endorsing Sen. Hillary Clinton .

Craig Varoga, the Alliance's president, was former campaign manager for Vilsack's brief presidential effort. Joe Householder was the governor's communications director in his 2002 reelection campaign. In 2003 and 2004, Householder became communications director for Clinton, and now works at Public Strategies, a Texas-based consulting firm.

Varoga hopes to attract donations, say $2 million, for ads and activities to generate attention for the concept of energy independence and to urge presidential candidates to get specific on the topic, a perennial issue for the past several presidential contests.

"If we wake up in November 2008," says Varoga, "and there was no serious discussion about energy independence, we'll be worse off."

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Praising High Court, Hillary Clinton Assails G.O.P. Field // NYT // Nicholas Fandos – June 26, 2015

FAIRFAX, Va. — Hillary Rodham Clinton on Friday night berated her Republican presidential rivals for protesting the Supreme Court's decision legalizing gay marriage and for resisting stricter gun laws after the mass shooting in Charleston.

Reflecting on what she called "an emotional roller-coaster of a day," Mrs. Clinton lauded the 5-4 decision recognizing gay marriage and renewed her calls for "common sense" gun control. But she saved her strongest words for criticizing the Republican contenders, who she said "seemed determined to lead us right back into the past" on those and other issues.

"Instead of trying to turn back the clock, they should be joining us in saying loudly and clearly saying no — no to discrimination, once and for all," Mrs. Clinton said. "I am asking them, please, don't make the rights, the hopes of any American into a political football for this 2016 campaign."

Following the court's decision Friday morning, several Republican presidential hopefuls, including Senator Ted Cruz of Texas, Gov. Bobby Jindal of Louisiana, and Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, called for a constitutional amendment allowing states to define marriage as they wish.

Mrs. Clinton, who has repeatedly argued for "common sense" gun control measures since the shootings last week, also drew attention to a vote by the Republican-led House Appropriations Committee on Tuesday against an amendment that would have channeled increased funding to the Centers of Disease Control to study gun violence.

"How can you watch massacre after massacre and take that vote?" Mrs. Clinton said.

She proceeded to critique the Republicans systematically on a long list of issues, from the Affordable Care Act to climate change to women's reproductive health, and without using his name, again rebuked Donald J. Trump for referring to Mexican immigrants in his campaign announcement speech this week as rapists and criminals.

Mrs. Clinton opened her speech, though, by addressing the court's same-sex marriage ruling directly. She called it a triumph for love, equality and the country, and read aloud the concluding portion of the court's majority opinion, written by Justice Anthony Kennedy.

"Today's decision confirms we've been working toward equality as a nation, step by step, case by case, court by court, and that equality has been right there in the Constitution all along," Mrs. Clinton said. "There is something quite remarkable about that."

Her remarks came before the Democratic Party of Virginia's annual Jefferson Jackson Dinner at George Mason University here. Before taking the stage, she spent the afternoon in Charleston, where she attended the funeral of Rev. Clementa C. Pinckney, a state senator and the pastor of Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church, who was killed there along with eight others in a mass shooting last week.

Mrs. Clinton's visit to Virginia was the first since declaring her candidacy in April. It is also one of her first campaign events outside the early primary states. She has close ties to Democrats in the state, but Virginia is expected to be hotly contested in 2016.

Hillary Clinton is already campaigning in Virginia, and this is why. // WaPo // Rachel Weiner – June 26, 2015

Democratic front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton will make her campaign debut in Virginia on Friday night, her first stop as a presidential candidate in a state that Republicans feel they must win if they are to recapture the White House.

Clinton will headline a Democratic rally at the Patriot Center at George Mason University in Fairfax, which has replaced the annual party dinner in Richmond. Democratic leaders are hoping enthusiasm for the former secretary of state will inspire activists to start mobilizing for this fall.

The visit is one of Clinton's first forays outside the early primary states, a sign of how critical Virginia is to both Democrats and Republicans in 2016. State legislative elections in November, with control of the state Senate at stake, will be an early sign of which party is better mobilized for 2016.

Virginia Democratic Party spokeswoman Morgan Finkelstein said the goal is for attendees to come away thinking that "the time to kick it into gear has come — it's not September, it's not next fall, it's now."

Clinton's task is to deliver that burst of enthusiasm. With the official launch of her campaign earlier this month, she has been shifting from small roundtables to larger rallies. Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), her socialist-leaning Democratic rival, is competing with her on that front, drawing huge crowds in Iowa and elsewhere as he attacks Clinton from the left.

"She's reached Virginia early because Virginia is going to be probably one of the two or three most important states," said Quentin Kidd, director of the Wason Center for Public Policy at Christopher Newport University.

"If she doesn't perform well, if she doesn't energize and kind of send a little bit of energy through the core of the Democratic Party in Virginia, it could just make things in Virginia more difficult for her to get going."

To repeat President Obama's success in the state in 2008 and 2012, Clinton will need to in particular turn out Virginia's Hispanic and African American voters in large numbers.

A spokesman for Clinton's campaign would not offer any details on her speech, beyond that she will be "sharing her vision for Virginians that will help them get ahead, and stay ahead."

Republicans see the state as equally critical. Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus is giving a news conference Friday afternoon outside the site of the Clinton event, joined by state party chairman and 2014

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

U.S. Senate candidate Ed Gillespie.

“A quick stop in the state for a Democrat fundraiser won’t win back the trust of the voters still waiting for answers from Hillary Clinton,” RNC spokeswoman Ali Pardo said in a statement.

Gillespie and Priebus have been helping to rebuild a state party that is fractured and financially strained by ideological division. The GOP has been recruiting minority candidates in Virginia in an effort to expand its base.

Gov. Terry McAuliffe (D), a close friend of Clinton’s who will introduce her Friday evening, has said repeatedly that the best way to help her win is to focus on the state’s economy.

But he has also made several recent moves that will appeal to the Democratic base. He engaged in the state primaries, helping unseat a conservative Democrat and propel his preferred candidates to victory. He is phasing out Confederate license plates in the state, launching a study of whether to bring back parole and easing the restoration of voting rights for ex-felons. In the wake of the Supreme Court ruling on the Affordable Care Act, he is pushing again for Medicaid expansion despite firm Republican opposition.

Thousands are expected to turn out for Clinton, but the shift from a relatively intimate dinner in a hotel ballroom to a giant event has vexed some party activists.

“People were disappointed,” said Harry Wiggins, chairman of the Prince William County Democratic Party, who is not attending the event. “I think a lot of people were surprised that it’s turning into essentially a pep rally.”

Finkelstein said the party was planning to hold a more traditional dinner later this year.

“People do not like change,” said Fairfax Democratic Party Chairwoman Sue Langley. But she said she was looking forward to the Clinton rally, especially because “we don’t have to dress up.”

LGBT Issues, Racism, Immigration: Hillary Clinton Pitches Herself As A “Fighter” For All Occasions // Buzzfeed // Ruby Cramer – June 27, 2015

FAIRFAX, Va. — On a Saturday night in April — hours before Hillary Clinton declared herself a candidate for president — advisers previewed her campaign message for the first time. The crux was this: She would be a “tenacious fighter.”

Later that week, she unveiled the pillars of her campaign — the “four fights.”

And at her first rally two months later — when she ascended an H-shaped stage on Roosevelt Island to explain, with a careful mixing of biography and position, her reasons for running — she cast herself repeatedly as a “fighter for all Americans.”

The characterization, reinforced in official memos and emails and reprinted frequently in the press, has acted increasingly as the discernible through-line in a campaign that has already sought to address a vast spread of policy issues: mass incarceration, immigration, small businesses, voting rights, the economy.

At a Virginia Democratic Party dinner here on Friday night, the Clinton campaign turned to the same theme again to address the last nine days — a period that began with a mass shooting at a black church in Charleston, South Carolina, and ended with the Supreme Court's decision in favor of nationwide same-sex marriage.

Terry McAuliffe, the governor of Virginia and an old friend of the Clintons, introduced the candidate at George Mason University's Patriot Center. Clinton, he said, was "smart." She was "tough." She was "compassionate." Then he paused. "But most of all, why do I love Hillary Clinton?"

"Because Hillary Clinton is a tenacious fighter," McAuliffe told the crowd of 2,000 in the arena. "She's been beaten up, she's been knocked down, but every time she does, she gets right back up. She dusts herself off, and she gets right back in that arena again, folks."

While other political figures were reticent to discuss the racial motivations behind the shooting, McAuliffe said, Clinton "stepped forward and began a national conversation about race [and] gun violence." The week after nine died in Charleston, Clinton described the killings "an act of racist terrorism." And earlier on Friday, she attended the funeral of one of the victims, Rev. Clementa Pinckney.

"Now, I know it's tempting to dismiss a terrible tragedy like Charleston as an isolated incident, to believe that in today's America bigotry is largely behind us," Clinton said on Friday night.

"But despite our best efforts, and our highest hopes, America's long struggle with racism is far from finished. And let's be honest, let's be honest, despite today's ruling, our struggle to end LGBT discrimination is also far from finished."

"That's because fear and hatred are far from finished. And so our march goes on."

In one, long line that closed her speech — and moved the arena into a standing ovation — Clinton pitched herself as the president to best wage that fight.

"I will go to bat for the successful, the striving, and the struggling; for the innovators and the inventors; for the factory workers and food servers who stand on their feet all day; for the nurses who work the night shift; for the truckers who drive for hours," she said, starting to lose her breath, "for the farmers who feed us; for the veterans who served our country; for the small business owners who took a risk; for the gay couple who loved each other; for the black child who still lives in the shadow of discrimination; and the Hispanic child who still lives in the shadow of deportation."

"Just as Terry said," Clinton told the crowd, winding down, "I'm on the side for everyone who's every been knocked down but refused to be knocked out."

"I will always stand my ground."

When she finished speaking, Clinton moved from the podium to shake hands below the stage, and the loudspeakers filled the hall with a song by pop singer Kris Allen that the campaign will no doubt play again and again and again.

They could knock you down and make you fall…

We'll get back up cause after all…

Clinton camp weekend plans: Energize states besides Iowa and New Hampshire // CNN // Dan Merica – June 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton's campaign aides have long said they are focused on Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada - the four critical early nominating states. This weekend, the campaign turns its focus to the other 46 states.

Clinton campaign aides, volunteers and supporters will hold over 200 activities and events in the 46-non early nominating states this weekend, campaign officials told CNN on Friday.

Events will include phone banks, happy hours and house parties. Volunteers will canvas at a farmer's market in Oahu, Hawaii, march in a gay pride parade in San Francisco and make phone calls at a bingo hall in Durant, Oklahoma, among other events.

The 72-hour push -- called the "Weekend of Action" -- serves multiple practical and symbolic purposes for the campaign.

Symbolically, the simultaneous activities will also help aides rebut questions about the excitement around the Clinton campaign. Since the former first lady announced, political watches and critics have questioned whether Democrats are as excited for Clinton as they were for President Barack Obama in 2008.

It is unclear whether each event this weekend will be well attended and the proof of success in sparking excitement will be good turnout, but aides will likely use the 200-event push to show Clinton's broad support across the country.

Despite describing themselves as a small, scrappy operation, the Clinton campaign has grown quickly since the former secretary of state announced her presidential run in April. Shortly after announcing, the campaign dispatched at least one volunteer to each state and territory.

This 72-hour spree is meant to serve a similar purpose: It is a way for the campaign to flex its grassroots muscle, especially to other Democratic campaigns who don't currently have the operation to put together this kind of a show of force.

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Hillary Clinton Visits Virginia, a Bellwether State in 2016 Race // NYT // Amy Chozick – June 26, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton will make the first stop of her presidential campaign in Virginia on Friday to headline the local Democratic Party's Jefferson Jackson dinner.

Her remarks will come against the backdrop of major Supreme Court decisions. She celebrated on Thursday the court's ruling to affirm a key part of President Obama's Affordable Care Act, writing on Twitter: "Yes! SCOTUS affirms what we know is true in our hearts and under the law: Health insurance should be affordable & available to all."

And she has implored the justices to rule that states cannot ban same-sex marriage.

Mrs. Clinton will likely address both cases in the Virginia address, but the state, with its large black population, will also present her the opportunity to continue her remarks on race and what she calls "common sense gun control" in the aftermath of the attack at a black church in Charleston, S.C.

Virginia represents a trend indicator of sorts in the 2016 race. For the Clinton campaign, the goal will be to appeal to a broad cross-section of black and white voters.

Senator Barack Obama won the state in 2008, the first time a Democratic presidential nominee captured Virginia since President Lyndon B. Johnson in 1964. President Obama also defeated Mitt Romney in Virginia in 2012.

Mrs. Clinton has deep ties to Virginia. A longtime ally and fund-raiser for Bill and Hillary Clinton, Terry McAuliffe, was elected governor in 2013.

Mr. McAuliffe's campaign manager in that close election, Robby Mook, now runs Mrs. Clinton's campaign and is introducing a similar data-driven grass-roots strategy. He brought with him an army of young operatives (the so-called Mook Mafia), many of whom helped Mr. McAuliffe defeat his conservative Republican opponent, Ken Cuccinelli.

Clinton Volunteers On Hunt For Brooklyn Apartments // NYT // Amy Chozick and Maggie Haberman – June 26, 2015

When Jesse Lehrich heard he might have a chance to work on Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential campaign, he did what most young staffers did. He moved to New York as an unpaid volunteer until Mrs. Clinton officially announced her candidacy and opened her headquarters in Downtown Brooklyn.

First, he stayed with his brother in a one-bedroom in Carroll Gardens, Brooklyn, until his eight boxes of clothes in the living room started to become annoying.

"He said: 'I hope this isn't a long-term solution, but I won't let you sleep on the street,' " Mr. Lehrich, who turns 26 this weekend, said of his older brother.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Eventually, he found a room in an East Village apartment just above the glowing red silhouette of a rooster that marks the famed gay bar the Cock.

Mr. Lehrich has three roommates and his room does not have windows, but at $1,700 a month (partly paid for with his saved-up bar mitzvah money), the price was right. “All I’ll be doing is working and sleeping,” he said, “so who needs windows?”

For decades, idealistic twenty-somethings have shunned higher-paying and more permanent jobs for the altruism and adrenaline rush of working to get a candidate to the White House. But the staffers who have signed up for the Clinton campaign face a daunting obstacle: the New York City real estate market.

In Iowa and New Hampshire, “supporter housing,” the practice of locals hosting the army of young volunteers who descend on the state each election cycle, is a time-honored tradition. Every political organizer has tales of talking about the days of F.D.R. with an old lady in Waterloo or sharing a bunk bed with the son of a union organizer in Manchester. But in New York, the situation is not so straightforward. Few New Yorkers have the extra space of, say, a farmhouse in Iowa. The wealthy donors who contribute to Mrs. Clinton’s campaign have proved more comfortable cutting a check than opening their TriBeCa lofts and Upper East Side townhouses to strangers. And Mrs. Clinton’s campaign prides itself on living on the cheap and keeping salaries low, which is good for its own bottom line, but difficult for those who need to pay New York City rents.

The lack of affordable housing has put an added burden on the Clinton campaign to play a Craigslist-like role in finding staffers a place to sleep, whether it’s pairing them with roommates or pleading with supporters for a spare room.

Jasmin Harris, a 22-year-old Clinton campaign worker, had been matched with a middle-age couple who agreed to host her in their Brooklyn Heights apartment. They even did her laundry. But after six weeks, they had out-of-town family coming to visit and needed the spare room back, and Ms. Harris was waiting on a recent afternoon for the campaign to pair her with another supporter. “I don’t know exactly where I’m going, but I’ll be somewhere else tonight,” she said. “I have my bags packed and am waiting for an email.”

A recent email from the campaign pleaded with donors to provide staffers with “a spare room — or just a spare couch!” because “you and I both know that finding a place to live in New York can take longer than an afternoon of apartment hunting.”

Marc Lasry, a hedge fund manager, a major Democratic donor and a friend of the Clintons, let the campaign’s communications director, Jennifer Palmieri, stay in his family’s Manhattan home, a penthouse on Central Park West, for a handful of nights early on. The city, he said, “is expensive, particularly for young people. We have five children, so we are used to having a lot of people around, and we’re happy to put up folks from the campaign.”

Mr. Lasry is not the norm. When the campaign’s finance director, Dennis Cheng, reached out to New York donors, some of them seemed concerned with the prospective maze of campaign finance laws and with how providing upscale housing in New York City might be interpreted. Several of the hedge fund managers and finance titans who support Mrs. Clinton hosted would-be aides before the campaign’s start in April, but ended the practice once a formal campaign existed. (A campaign finance lawyer, Kenneth A. Gross of Skadden, Arps, said, however, that hosting campaign workers would not be considered an in-kind donation.)

Scott Murphy, a former congressman representing the area outside Albany, hosted Josh Schwerin, 29, a press aide on the campaign who previously worked for Mr. Murphy, in his Upper West Side co-op before the campaign started.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Schwerin got what used to serve as a maid's room. "You could touch both walls if you were on the air mattress, and the bathroom was through the kitchen, so he didn't have a lot of privacy," Mr. Murphy said. "But," he added, "it was in line with what he paid for it." (Which was, of course, nothing.) Mr. Schwerin later found an apartment near Fort Greene Park, a 12-minute walk to the office.

Many of the campaign workers who moved to Brooklyn from across the country were unfamiliar with the borough and thought it would offer cheaper prices than "the city" (read: Manhattan). But in the past year, average rents in Brooklyn have risen by 4.3 percent, nearly twice the increase of those in Manhattan, to $3,252 a month. Rents in Brooklyn Heights, a neighborhood adjacent to campaign headquarters, are the highest in the borough, according to Jonathan J. Miller, the president of the appraisal firm Miller Samuel.

The campaign has worked with the Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce for guidance on where staffers could find housing. The chamber suggested Clinton Hill, Bedford-Stuyvesant, Bensonhurst and Dyker Heights, but has not made much progress in convincing staffers to consider these less gentrified neighborhoods, said Carlo A. Scissura, the president and chief executive of the chamber.

"These folks are coming from all parts of the country to work for Hillary, and the broker says, 'I want 15 percent of annual rent,' and they're like 'What are you talking about?' " said David J. Maundrell III, the founder of aptsandlofts.com , a real estate brokerage specializing in Brooklyn.

Some have had luck at a rental building on the edge of Downtown Brooklyn, Avalon Fort Greene, where at least six Clinton aides have taken up residence, prompting some campaign staffers to affectionately call it "the dorm," a reference to their small quarters and proximity to one another.

Adrienne Elrod, 39, a campaign spokeswoman, is originally from Arkansas but moved to Brooklyn from Washington with her corgi-terrier mix, Bernie (not named after Mrs. Clinton's primary opponent Senator Bernie Sanders). If she stretches her arms far enough in her tidy studio in "the dorm," she can almost touch the foot of her bed and her kitchen countertop at the same time.

An exercise aficionado, Ms. Elrod has a bike resting against a patch of bare wall. Her refrigerator is adorned with a few stickers, including the "H" logo with an arrow that symbolizes Hillary for America.

"It's a 10-minute walk from the office," Ms. Elrod said. "It's easy to come home in the middle of the day to walk the dog."

Marlon Marshall, 35, a veteran organizer who is now the director of state campaigns and political engagement for the Clinton campaign, crashed in the spring with the pollster Joel Benenson in his Upper East Side co-op.

Mr. Benenson recalled sleeping on a friend's couch in New York City during Mario Cuomo's campaign for governor in 1994, when his family was living in Albany. And in 2008, during the Obama campaign, when Mr. Benenson still lived in New Jersey, he and his wife, Lisa, played host to four young organizers.

"We refer to them as our Obama kids," he said. So when he was asked to house campaign staffers this time, he didn't hesitate. "We hardly ever saw Marlon," he said of Mr. Marshall, who primarily used the place to sleep for a few hours before going back to work.

Mr. Marshall, who had never lived in New York before, ended up renting a friend's two-bedroom apartment in a Fort Greene co-op, an eight-minute walk from the campaign's headquarters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He now hosts a rotating cast of staffers in his spare bedroom and in his free time explores the borough. “I have been to the Smorgasburg, and it is the greatest thing in my life,” Mr. Marshall said of the borough’s popular weekly food festival.

Cheering Marriage Decision, Hillary Clinton Heads to Provincetown // NYT // Amy Chozick – June 26, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton transformed her H-and-an-arrow campaign logo into a gay-rights rainbow on Friday to mark the Supreme Court’s same-sex marriage ruling. She issued a statement calling the court’s decision “an affirmation of the commitment of couples across the country who love one another.” Her campaign sells a variety of branded “Hillary” items timed to June’s Gay Pride Month.

But on Thursday, Mrs. Clinton will make perhaps her most gay-friendly move: She will visit Provincetown, Mass.

The seaside enclave — in the state that was first to legalize same-sex marriage — has long been a Shangri-La for gay men and lesbians who enjoy raucous, romantic or just relaxing weekends in the scenic city at the northern tip of Cape Cod.

In 2012, the Census reported that Provincetown had 163.1 same-sex couples per 1,000 people, the most of any city in the country.

As much as it may call to mind drag-queen pool parties or kitschy rainbow-festooned nightclubs, Provincetown has served a far more serious purpose: Historically, it was one of the few resort locales where gay men and lesbians could openly enjoy a vacation without the threat of discrimination or worse.

Mrs. Clinton, who maintains strong support among gay people, and whose campaign recently released a video showing same-sex couples before and during their weddings, will attend a fund-raiser in Provincetown hosted by Bryan Rafanelli, an event planner, and Alix Ritchie, a prominent gay-rights activist. The event is part of a string of fund-raisers Mrs. Clinton has arranged in and around Boston in early July.

It was planned weeks ago — but just became extremely well timed.

Hillary Clinton’s Long Road to Supporting Gay Marriage // WSJ // Peter Nicholas – June 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton applauded the Supreme Court ruling that legalizes gay marriage nationwide, putting out a statement Friday praising the gay rights activists who “sacrificed so much for this victory.”

Yet it wasn’t so long ago that these same activists might have seen Mrs. Clinton as an adversary on the issue.

For most of her career in politics Mrs. Clinton supported many gay-rights stances but opposed same-sex marriage, favoring arrangements like civil unions that fell short of marriage. Not until 2013 did she take the position that gays and lesbians should be allowed to marry.

Her evolution has largely tracked public opinion. As the country has gotten more comfortable with same sex marriage, Mrs. Clinton’s opposition has softened.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Facing re-election in 1996, her husband Bill Clinton signed the Defense of Marriage Act, which described marriage as the union of a man and a woman.

That was Mrs. Clinton's position on the matter, too.

Running for a U.S. senate seat in New York, Mrs. Clinton in 2000 said: "Marriage has got historic, religious and moral content that goes back to the beginning of time, and I think a marriage is as a marriage has always been, between a man and a woman."

Whatever her position on gay marriage, she maintained strong political ties to members of the gay community. In that same Senate race, she collected $125,000 from a fundraising event organized by a gay activist in New York, The Wall Street Journal reported at the time.

As a sitting senator in 2004, she spoke on the Senate floor against a proposed constitutional amendment barring same sex marriage. Yet she maintained that "marriage is not just a bond, but a sacred bond between a man and a woman."

A wrinkle emerged in 2006 when, according to press reports, she told a group of gay elected officials that if New York state officials were to legalize gay marriage, she would not oppose such a move.

"Obviously my friends and people who spoke to me — we've had many long conversations and I think ... that the way that I have spoken and I have advocated has certainly evolved and I am happy to be educated and to learn as much as I can," she said.

She maintained her opposition to same sex marriage as a candidate for president in 2008 – as did the ultimate winner, Barack Obama.

A secretary of state doesn't normally wade into politically-fraught domestic debates. So, as Mr. Obama and Vice President Joe Biden announced their support for same sex marriage in 2012, Mrs. Clinton didn't choose to weigh in. In March 2013, though — two after she stepped down as secretary of state — she proclaimed her support for same sex marriage.

"I support it personally and as a matter of policy and law," she said.

Evaluating whether she has flip-flopped, PolitiFact, an independent fact-checker, wrote last week that when it comes to gay marriage, "we give Clinton a Full Flop."

WASHINGTON—Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's failure to turn over at least 15 work-related emails to the State Department is expected to prompt a broader congressional inquiry into her email practices while she served in the Obama administration.

The State Department revealed this week that a small number of emails were missing in part or in whole from their archive of more than 55,000 pages of work-related emails that Mrs. Clinton gave to the department last year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Those emails were obtained by the House Select Committee investigating the 2012 Benghazi attacks from Sidney Blumenthal, a close confident and former aid of Mrs. Clinton's.

Republican lawmakers involved in the investigation said the revelations raised new and troubling questions about the Democratic presidential candidate's compliance with the law.

"It looks like the State Department didn't give us everything that Blumenthal did, and Hillary Clinton didn't give everything to the State Department," said Rep. Jim Jordan, an Ohio Republican on the panel investigating the matter.

As Secretary of State, Mrs. Clinton exclusively used her own email account run off a personal server for all her work-related correspondence in an arrangement that was legal though discouraged during her time in government. The arrangement has prompted questions about whether Mrs. Clinton has complied with records laws that require preservation of federal records.

The emails' absence in State Department records contradicts Mrs. Clinton's public claims that she turned over all relevant federal records before deleting her entire email server. In a March news conference, Mrs. Clinton assured reporters that her attorneys did a thorough search before turning over all work-related correspondence as required by federal record-keeping laws.

The revelations also intensified calls for Mrs. Clinton to turn over her personal email server to a neutral third party—a call that Republicans on the Benghazi committee have been making for months.

"We not only want to see it—but the American people deserve to have those official documents that were contained on her private server," said Rep. Mike Pompeo about the email server.

The State Department acknowledged Friday that the 15 missing emails appeared to be work-related and not personal—and therefore should have been given by Mrs. Clinton to the department.

State Department spokesman John Kirby said he couldn't account for why they weren't produced by Mrs. Clinton initially and that he wasn't certain that the department was in possession of her full set of emails.

"Unless you have another inventory to check it against, like in this case we had Mr. Blumenthal's emails—it's hard to know," he said.

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton said that "she has turned over 55,000 pages of materials to the State Department, including all emails in her possession from Mr. Blumenthal."

Mr. Pompeo, a Republican member of the panel, said he was "doing everything that we have the power to do" to get answers from Mrs. Clinton.

Mr. Kirby said that the department wouldn't itself investigate whether it was in possession of all of Mrs. Clinton's emails. The department's independent inspector general is conducting a general review of information management, but a spokesman for the IG didn't say whether Mrs. Clinton's emails would be part of the scope of the investigation.

Democrats have accused the Benghazi panel of straying from its original mission of investigating the 2012 terrorist attack. “This Benghazi select committee has become the committee to investigate Hillary Clinton. Period,” Rep. Elijah Cummings, the top Democrat on the panel, said last week.

House Speaker John Boehner (R., Ohio) has said he is open to the possibility of subpoenaing the server. A spokesman declined to comment. Benghazi committee chairman Trey Gowdy (R., S.C.) said he was “considering carefully” his committee’s next steps.

Richard Painter, a White House ethics lawyer under President George W. Bush, said that running one’s own personal server email server instead of using government email means “you’re stuck with the consequences.”

“When you have hundreds of thousands of emails and you start using your personal emails, stuff could get lost,” he said.

From opposition to embrace: Obama's and Clinton's public evolution on same-sex marriage // AP // Jim Kuhnhenn and Lisa Lerer – June 27, 2015

WASHINGTON — When President Barack Obama praised the Supreme Court's watershed same-sex marriage ruling, he held it up as evidence that a "shift in hearts and minds is possible."

Obama may well have been describing his own public trajectory on gay unions — a complicated path that took him through opposition and ambivalence to enthusiastic embrace.

His journey is not unlike the rest of America. But over the years he has worn his uncertainty on his sleeve, publicly musing about his stance before becoming a full-throated advocate for marriage and other aspects of gay rights.

"When all Americans are treated as equal, we are all more free," Obama declared Friday.

As far as political figures go, Obama's road to "yes" is hardly unique.

Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential campaign jumped on the Supreme Court decision, changing its red campaign logo to a rainbow colored H, releasing a gauzy video of gay wedding ceremonies, and blasting out supportive tweets aimed at building its campaign list.

In a fiery speech Friday night to Democratic activists in Northern Virginia, Clinton said that "love triumphed in the highest court" and declared: "We can sum up the message from the court and the American people in just two words: Move on."

But like Obama, such expressions of support mark a remarkable shift for Clinton, who opposed gay marriage for more than two decades as a first lady, a U.S. senator and a presidential candidate. Just three months ago, Clinton's position was that while she personally supported gay marriage the issue was best left for individual states to decide — a policy stance held by most of the Republican presidential field.

"It has been an evolutionary process," said Fred Sainz of the Human Rights Campaign, a national gay rights group. But he said Obama now stands as one of the great champions of gay rights, up there with the likes of Harvey Milk.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As for Clinton, he said, "she connects with gay people on a level that is beyond explanation."

Obama has carefully staked out his position on same-sex marriage throughout his political career. During his 1996 Illinois state Senate race, he replied to a questionnaire from a gay newspaper in Chicago: "I favor legalizing same-sex marriages, and would fight efforts to prohibit such marriages." Two years later, he declared himself undecided.

By 2004, as he ran for the U.S. Senate, he said he opposed gay marriage for politically strategic reasons, saying Republicans would exploit the issue, and he advocated instead for gay civil unions. In his 2006 book, "The Audacity of Hope," he cited his own faith as a reason to oppose same-sex marriage, though he also wondered whether "in years hence I may be seen as someone who was on the wrong side of history."

He came out firmly for same-sex marriage in 2012 and called for it in his second inaugural address. But earlier this year, his former top strategist, David Axelrod, wrote that Obama had feigned opposition to gay marriage for most of his political career, grudgingly taking Axelrod's advice that African-American religious leaders and others would oppose him if he let it be known he supported gay marriage.

"If Obama's views were 'evolving' publicly, they were fully evolved behind closed doors," Axelrod wrote.

Obama disputed the account, telling BuzzFeed News that he thought civil unions were "a sufficient way of squaring the circle," but that "the pain and the sense of stigma that was being placed on same-sex couples who are friends of mine" changed his mind.

"I think the notion that somehow I was always in favor of marriage per se isn't quite accurate," Obama told BuzzFeed.

But even after he endorsed gay marriage, he took his time embracing other aspects of the gay community's agenda.

It wasn't until July 2014 that Obama gave employment protection to gay and transgender workers in the federal government and its contracting agencies.

Still, gay rights advocates hold him up as one of their biggest political advocates.

"It's absolutely right to note that this administration did not get off to a good start with LGBT advocates," Sainz said. "But the sheer volume of what he has done will be hard for another president to replicate, simply because so much of what he has done has been so incredibly powerful, momentous and life changing for LGBT people."

Clinton's path into the embrace of the gay community has been similar. She backed her husband's Defense of Marriage Act in 1996, described marriage between a man and a woman as a "fundamental bedrock principle" in a 2004 Senate floor speech, and dodged the question when asked in 2007 whether she agreed with Gen. Peter Pace, then the Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman, that homosexuality was immoral.

But as secretary of state, Clinton emerged as a champion of gay rights, declaring that "gay rights are human rights, and human rights are gay rights," at a 2011 conference in Geneva.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sainz said that in Clinton, the LGBT community sees a kindred spirit. "It's in our DNA to support her," he said. "We have been forced to deal with some of lives greatest indignities and have come out on the other side."

Hillary Clinton slams GOP as 'party of the past' // Politico // Gabriel Debenedetti – June 26, 2015

FAIRFAX, Va. — Hillary Clinton looked to draw a red line for her Republican rivals on LGBT rights in her first large swing-state rally outside of the early-voting states on Friday night, pointedly urging them not to turn “the hopes of any American into a political football for this 2016 campaign.”

“Instead of turning back the clock, they should be joining us in saying ‘no’ — ‘no’ to discrimination for once and for all,” Clinton said in a fiery speech at a fundraising rally for the Democratic Party of Virginia here in Fairfax just hours after the Supreme Court legalized gay marriage nationwide.

“This morning, love triumphed in the highest court in our land. Equality triumphed. America triumphed,” she said before quoting the final paragraph of Justice Anthony Kennedy’s decision.

While the event was not intended to be a Clinton rally, it quickly turned into one as speaker after speaker praised the former secretary of state in front of the crowd of around 2,000. She was introduced by her longtime friend Gov. Terry McAuliffe, who himself spoke after Democratic Sens. Mark Warner and Tim Kaine — who also left no doubt about where their political loyalties lie.

The Democratic front-runner did not call out any of the Republican White House hopefuls by name, but she derided the calls from some of them to pass a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage, insisting that the lesson of a week that saw the Supreme Court affirm the legality of Obamacare and that saw a widespread backlash against the Confederate flag was that Republicans should “move on.”

“Today’s decision confirms we’ve been working toward equality as a nation step by step, case by case, court by court, and that equality has been right there in the Constitution all along,” said the former first lady and senator, who didn’t support marriage equality when she first ran for president in 2008.

Coming straight to the rally from the Charleston funeral of the Rev. Clementa Pinckney — who was killed along with eight other African-American churchgoers in the shooting last week — Clinton also promised to fight for a “better, smarter, safer, approach to getting the gun violence in this country under control.”

Clinton sat in the front row at the afternoon service, at which President Barack Obama delivered a eulogy for Pinckney that the former secretary of state said “stirred” her. Hours later, in perhaps the most political of her campaign speeches so far, she applauded both South Carolina’s Republican governor Nikki Haley and McAuliffe for speaking out against public use of the Confederate flag.

But she was also withering in her criticism of some Republican rivals in particular.

Responding to Donald Trump’s characterization of Mexican immigrants as “bringing drugs, they’re bringing crime, they’re rapists,” Clinton suggested — without using Trump’s name — “maybe he’s never met them.”

And on a day after new polls showed that Clinton’s primary Democratic rival for the nomination Bernie Sanders is gaining on her in some early-voting states, she made clear that she would keep her focus on Republicans, not her fellow party members.

"Across the board, they are the party of the past," she said to applause. "Not the party of the future."

Gay marriage ruling: A political gift to Hillary Clinton? // Politico // Annie Karni – June 26, 2015

You might say the Supreme Court's decision to make same-sex marriage a nationwide right was an in-kind contribution to Hillary for America.

Never mind that the 5-4 ruling could easily have gone the other way: It gives her a chance to stress the importance of nominating liberal Supreme Court justices, and creates a moment of enthusiasm in the LGBT community that her campaign needs to ride. It places her squarely in the mainstream of public opinion. And it puts her stance in sharp relief against the Republicans fulminating, to various degrees, at the majority's break with tradition.

It also delivers to her opponents in the Democratic primary a chance to tell voters that they were on the right side of history first — but that might not matter much.

"Along with millions of Americans, I am celebrating today's landmark victory for marriage equality, and the generations of advocates and activists who fought to make it possible," Clinton said in a statement Friday morning. "From Stonewall to the Supreme Court, the courage and determination of the LGBT community has changed hearts and changed laws."

She said the ruling "represents our country at its best: inclusive, open, and striving towards true equality."

With about 60 percent of Americans supporting gay marriage, according to recent polls, Clinton's position in favor of a constitutional right to same-sex marriage offers a winning contrast with most of the Republican field — especially among younger voters. The Supreme Court ruling takes away some of that drama, now that the issue no longer hangs in balance.

But Democrats said there are still opportunities for Clinton to position herself as a fighter for civil rights. "There's going to be a backlash among religious conservatives to this ruling today," said Hilary Rosen, a Democratic strategist and loyal Clinton supporter. "There will be plenty of leadership opportunities for Hillary Clinton and other politicians to oppose the whittling away of this victory, with trumped-up exemptions. Republicans will make the mistake, I predict, in raising the rhetoric level." She pointed to Indiana's controversial religious freedom law as an example.

In her statement, Clinton hinted that the Supreme Court's ruling hadn't put the issue to bed. "For too many LGBT Americans who are subjected to discriminatory laws, true equality is still just out of reach," she said. "While we celebrate today, our work won't be finished until every American can not only marry, but live, work, pray, learn and raise a family free from discrimination and prejudice. We cannot settle for anything less."

Clinton is also expected to speak in the coming weeks about the importance of electing a president who can nominate progressive Supreme Court justices, a campaign aide said. This week's court rulings — on Obamacare, fair housing and same-sex marriage — highlight how galvanizing a political issue the appointments of justices can be, and the Clinton camp is eager to seize the moment.

In terms of the Democratic primary, however, Clinton's rivals might be tempted to ask why it took her so long to support the constitutional right to same-sex marriage — just last year, she said it was an issue left to the states to decide. Her opponents in the primary, former Gov. Martin O'Malley and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, were well ahead of her at the time.

As governor, O'Malley led Maryland's 2012 fight to legalize same-sex marriage — and likes to remind primary voters of that fact. "I'm glad Secretary Clinton's come around to the right positions on these issues," he said in April in a rare direct jab at the Democratic frontrunner. "I'm grateful to the people of Maryland for leading the way on this important issue of human dignity and equality under the law," he said in a brief statement Friday morning.

Sanders, meanwhile, voted against the Defense of Marriage Act in 1996, signed into law by President Bill Clinton. And Vermont was the first state to legalize same-sex unions in 2000. He supported the legalization of gay marriage in 2009. "For far too long our justice system has marginalized the gay community," Sanders said in his statement Friday, "and I am very glad the Court caught up to the American people."

It's not yet clear whether either candidate can take advantage of Clinton's changing views.

"In Iowa, some Democratic activists are very proud of having been in the lead on this issue early in the game," said Kenneth Sherrill, political science professor emeritus at Hunter College. "If O'Malley or Sanders are able to say, 'I was with you during your period of trouble,' that might be helpful to them. On the question of who is a courageous leader, who's willing to take risks in the name of justice, they may use this to picture Clinton as cautious and late to the game."

The LGBT community, however, has been fired up for Clinton's candidacy, and seemingly willing to overlook her less-than-perfect record on the issue of gay marriage. Many leaders in the community stressed that all mainstream national Democrats have been evolving on the issue — and they're simply happy that the time has come that a Democratic frontrunner for president can embrace a constitutional right to same-sex marriage.

"One of her platforms is equality for all, which is not something we saw in 2008," said Eunic Ortiz, president of the Stonewall Democrats of NYC, which won't endorse any candidate until 2016. "It's something she has evolved on. This is now equality for all, and we are looking forward."

Clinton was fully embracing the decision Friday morning online. On Twitter, the campaign changed her banner to say the word "HISTORY," in an all-caps, rainbow-colored font.

"She's certainly going to rejoice about the decision," Sherrill said. "At least she can say she came out for marriage equality before the Supreme Court did."

Republican National Committee Files FOIA Request on Hillary Clinton Personnel Practices // Bloomberg // Billy House – June 26, 2015

The Republican National Committee is pressing the State Department for information on whether former secretary of state Hillary Clinton and her chief of staff at the department, Cheryl Mills, failed to disclose a special arrangement allowing Mills to hold outside jobs.

A Freedom of Information Act request the RNC sent to the department Friday demands a copy of all records related to Mills' "selection, approval, status, and/or classification of Mills" as a special government employee in 2009 and again in 2013. Coming on the heels of a disclosure that Clinton's release of business-related emails she sent on a private account was incomplete, the RNC's latest move underscores Republicans' determination to maintain a relentless focus on the Democratic presidential frontrunner's managerial practices.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The RNC request follows a report that Mills had a special arrangement in 2009 that enabled her to continue to hold outside positions with the William J. Clinton Foundation, New York University, and as a board member for the school's UAE-funded Abu Dhabi campus.

At issue, for the RNC, is why Mills then was not included on a list of all special government employees for the year 2009, released by State last year in response to a FOIA request from ProPublica. She was included in a list for the year 2013.

Clinton's campaign had no immediate comment on the FOIA request.

“The fact that Secretary Clinton’s top State Department aide was allowed to receive outside income while serving as her Chief of Staff, and failed to disclose it is troubling," says RNC Research Director and Deputy Communications Director Raj Shah. "Now we are seeking to determine Mills’ and Clinton’s roles in covering it up."

The FOIA request Friday from the RNC calls for all records related to “ProPublica’s FOIA request regarding State Department special Government employees” including any discussion related to why Mills may have not been included in the 2009 list.

"To clarify, this request includes any records that may exist about ProPublica’s FOIA and why Cheryl Mills’ 2009 special Government status was excluded from the State Department’s FOIA response," the FOIA request states.

A State Department spokesman said the agency does not typically comment on FOIA requests.

Previous news accounts have reported another close Clinton aide, Huma Abedin, had been given special government employee status under Clinton, which also allowed her to have outside work along with being a part-time employee of the State Department.

The RNC has previously sent the State Department FOIA demands focused on Mills and other top aides who served there under Clinton, including Abedin and another longtime political adviser, Philippe Reines, regarding anything that said the words “Freedom of Information Act” or “FOIA” for discussions on the topic or other matters in which they may have intervened.

The RNC had not previously asked "for all records pertaining to any individual FOIA request or any matter outside of FOIA policy, such as employees receiving Special Government Employee status," said Shah.

Hillary Clinton's campaign is having prominent Democratic supporters host volunteer organizing events over the next two weeks.

The supporters will host open houses at offices around the state, spokeswoman Lily Adams said. They include former Lt. Gov. Sally Pederson; former Planned Parenthood of the Heartland President Jill June; State Reps. Abby Finkenauer of Dubuque, Phyllis Thede of Davenport, Mary Mascher of Iowa City and Timi Brown Powers of Waterloo; State Sens. Bill Dotzler of Waterloo and Jeff Danielson of Cedar Falls; former State Reps. Wes Whitead of Sioux City and Tyler Olson of Cedar Rapids; former state Sen. Staci Appel of Ackworth; Cedar Rapids City Councilman Justin Shields; former Cedar Rapids Mayor Lee Clancey; and former state party Chairwoman Sue Clinton's campaign, which faces a growing left-flank challenge from U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders, has been eager to show its early organizing strength. The campaign says it has opened 10 organizing offices in Iowa, with 27 organizers, who have held about 2,500 one-on-one meetings with voters since Clinton officially entered the race in April.

Hillary Clinton fired up over 'historic day' // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – June 26, 2015

FAIRFAX, Virginia – Hillary Clinton fired up almost 2,000 Virginia Democrats Friday night here at a party fundraiser hosted by her old friend, Gov. Terry McAuliffe, in one of the first major rallies of her second presidential campaign.

She said she was thrilled to be speaking to Democrats on "Such a historic day for our country."

Just hours ago, Clinton had attended the funeral for slain South Carolina pastor Clementa Pinckney, and before that celebrated the Supreme Court's marriage equality decision. She called it "an emotional roller coaster of a day," pleased that "love triumphed in the highest court in our land."

But she cautioned that the fight on both LGBT rights and race relations is not over. She also vowed, "I for one am never going to stop fighting" for gun control.

Inside the cavernous Patriot Center arena on the campus of George Mason University, it felt more like June 2016 than June 2016.

The screaming fans who often rose to their feet and chanted Clinton's name, the many invocations of "our next president," and setting in a key swing state, made the rally feel like a general election pep rally. That, even though Clinton aides have said she is squarely focused on the primary campaign and even as Sen. Bernie Sanders surges in polls.

Speaker after speaker praised Clinton as if the Democratic nomination were a fait accompli. "Hillary Clinton is our choice for the future!" said Sen. Mark Warner, the state's popular Democratic senator, to cheers.

And Clinton kept her sights squarely on Republicans, firing off on them on issue after issue. "Across the board, they are the party of the past, not the future," she said.

Rep. Gerry Connolly obliquely mentioned the other Democrats running for the nomination before waving them off. "Nobody has a stronger resume to be president of the United States than Hillary Rodham Clinton," said Connolly, who welcomed everyone to "Clinton territory."

Nearly every speaker said it was time to put a woman in the White House.

Former Sen. Jim Webb, who is considering a run and lives in nearby Arlington, was not mentioned. Neither was former Gov. Martin O'Malley, who hails from just across the river in Maryland.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But more than anything, the event was a chance for Clinton to help her old friend McAuliffe build the Democratic Party in a key presidential battleground state.

Clinton is rushing to fill her coffers ahead of the end of the finance quarter next week, but she will make no money from her appearance here. All the proceeds – more than $1 million, according to officials – will go to the Virginia Democratic Party.

McAuliffe chaired Hillary Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign and Bill Clinton's 1996 reelection run. He's raised tens of millions of dollars for both Clintons, and is now working to win the Virginia state Senate for Democrats and hold the seat in 2016.

Reunited on stage, McAuliffe now the governor of a large state and Clinton cruising to the Democratic nomination after both lots their first tries at each, they displayed the easy chemistry of old allies.

"This is personal for me," said McAuliffe of Clinton. "We've worked hard together, we've played hard together."

The governor explained that if he and his wife are on vacation with the former first couple, and he wants to enjoy a beer or cocktail in the evening, "I don't go looking for Bill Clinton. I go looking for Hillary Clinton. She's a lot more fun that Bill Clinton is!"

The love was mutual. Clinton said she was "starting to run out of superlatives" while praising McAuliffe after he introduced her.

"He's my kind of leader, a pragmatic progressive," Clinton added. "He prefers common ground to scorched earth."

Clinton will need a strong Democratic Party if she makes it to the general election in 2016 in the Virginia, which has become a key state in Democrats' post-Obama election electoral map.

Virginia Democrats have been on a tear lately, and especially under McAuliffe. The party now controls all five statewide offices for the first time in 40 years and has won two presidential elections in a row.

McAuliffe and the party are gearing up to try to win control of the state Senate in November of 2015, and the political organization they build can then be turned around to support Clinton.

Clinton Campaign's Amanda Renteria: How They're Building Latino Support // NBC News // Suzanne Gamboa – June 26, 2015

NEW YORK -- It may take several knocks on the same door before getting to an offer of a cafecito and election talk, but Hillary Clinton's national political director Amanda Renteria is sure those offers will come often as Latinos see they are a big part of Clinton's campaign focus.

"The first time, it's, 'Thank you very much.' The second time, it's, 'Okay, I'll listen' and the third time it's like, 'Come on in. Let's have a cafecito. Let's talk about this,'" Renteria said, talking about the Democratic candidate's on-the-ground efforts to reach potential Hispanic voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In an interview with NBC News, Renteria spoke about how the Clinton campaign is building its relationships with America's largest minority group.

The mission is one that has risen in importance as the Latino electorate has grown, even though it performs under its potential, and as campaigns take note of the oncoming onslaught of young Latinos who are turning 18 by the hundreds of thousands every year.

The history of the last two presidential elections is fresh enough to remind campaigns that President Barack Obama, though he did not win the white vote, got more than 70 percent of the Latino vote and secured two elections with a multiracial coalition that will continue to grow so that eight presidential elections from now whites will not longer be the majority.

For her part, Clinton has been speaking to Latino groups, including two recent visits to Las Vegas, a city whose population is about one third Hispanic. She's met with young immigrants without U.S. legal status as well as Latino officeholders, laying out her proposals such as a greater emphasis on early childhood education and her support for a path to citizenship for immigrant families.

"I think speaking Spanish isn't enough ... it's about the issues and who has been fighting for them," said Renteria, who is Mexican American. "I think when you see things coming from the Republican party and none of the Republicans stood up to the divisive words, the inflammatory words that a friend of theirs said, the community sees that kind of stuff."

Although she didn't name him, Renteria was referring remarks by Donald Trump, the real estate mogul and reality show TV host whose remarks about Mexicans and Mexico when he announced his presidential bid have drawn strong backlash. Just Thursday, the Spanish language network Univision announced it was dropping their deal to broadcast Miss Universe pageants (Trump is part owner, along with NBC Universal), over his referrals to immigrants crossing the border as rapists, drug users and criminals.

Clinton criticized Trump's comments at the time, saying "hotter and more negative" public discourse can trigger people who are less stable, a reference to the fatal shootings at a black church in South Carolina last week that ended the lives of nine people.

As Renteria sees it, Clinton can draw some affinity between Latino values and her life, even if she can't claim Hispanic identity or connect through a Latino spouse or children, as can Republican candidates Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio and Ted Cruz.

In her NALEO speech in Las Vegas last week, Clinton wove through issues relating to values often named by Latinos as part of their makeup: family, children, education and immigration reform.

She also spoke some about her own mother. In future events, Rentería said, Clinton will talk more about herself and her mother, Dorothy Rodham, who was raised by her severe grandparents after her parents divorced and who was on her own at 14.

"The whole story of it takes a village, that's so like the Latino community. It takes the grandparents, the mom, the vecinos (neighbors), everyone involved," said Renteria, invoking an African proverb that is a favorite of Clinton and was the title of a children's book she wrote.

Part of Renteria's job as national political director is to oversee interaction with coalition groups, those that advocate for Latinos, African Americans and others, and build support among them. She said she likes to describe her job to her parents as "trying to grow the biggest tent that's ever been built."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She said that after South Carolina, she finds it more of a responsibility to focus on a "welcoming" campaign. "I think it really does affect the fabric of our community, the fabric of our country. I think that for me that was a big change in terms of the seriousness of what we are doing ... and really building the tent," she said.

Renteria is part of that tent. From the Central Valley of California, Renteria's father is an immigrant from Zacatecas, Mexico who worked California's farm fields. Her mother was born in the U.S and is of Mexican descent. After studying economics at Stanford and working in the financial industry and as a teacher, Renteria become the first Latina hired as a chief of staff in the U.S. Senate. She made a run for Congress last year but lost to Republican incumbent Rep. David Valadao.

"We as a community need to have a voice in the political environment. I didn't grow up in this, but once you realize what kind of impact you can have and how you can help others in public service I hope more Latinos and different voices come together and are part of it," she said.

Hoping to build on Obama's success in galvanizing multiracial coalitions, the Clinton campaign wants to unite generations and bring together singular groups such as Latinos or African Americans for Hillary, so that they become for example, People of Color for Hillary, Renteria said.

"How do you build (support) deep within the communities, across generations, but also how do you then, bring everyone onto the stage?" she said, adding that taking a position on voting rights is one way.

When asked what are the issues Clinton will stress as she reaches out to Hispanics, Renteria said they would include the Democrats' achievements on health care access, and elaboration on her early campaign declaration that she would go beyond Obama's immigration executive action, including finding a way for parents of children not legally in the U.S. to remain and work.

"We already have an idea legally of what we can do a little bit further than the president ," Renteria said, "in large part, because he went as far as he did and we learned what worked and what didn't and now we get to tweak it a little bit more so it can work for more people."

Hillary Clinton hits Republicans over marriage, Obamacare rulings // CNN // Dan Merica – June 26, 2015

The Democratic frontrunner was speaking at a Jefferson Jackson fundraiser for the Virginia Democratic Party at George Mason University on a night in which she was repeatedly referred to by fellow Democrats as the next President of the United States.

"This morning, they all decried the Supreme Court's ruling," Clinton said, noting that "we even heard them call for a constitutional amendment" against same-sex marriage.

A fired-up Clinton then seemingly spoke directly at the 13 declared Republican presidential hopefuls.

"I am asking them, please, don't make the rights, the hopes, of any American into a political football for this 2016 campaign," she said. "LGBT Americans should be free not just to marry, but to live, learn and work, just like everybody else."

Republican response to the Supreme Court's decision was universally opposed, but politically mixed. Former

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Florida Gov. Jeb Bush called for respect for the court's decision, despite opposing it. On the other side of the spectrum, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal said he wants to amend the Constitution to leave the decision over who can marry up to each state.

Clinton read the last paragraph of Justice Anthony Kennedy's opinion from the stage on Friday, ending with, "And to that I say, amen, thank you."

"This morning, love triumphed in the highest court in our land," Clinton said. "Equality triumphed, America triumphed."

She did not mention former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee or Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders during the event, all of whom are vying to be the Democratic Party's nominee.

Clinton's stance on same-sex marriage has evolved over the years. Her husband, President Bill Clinton, signed the Defense of Marriage Act in 1996, which defined for federal purposes marriage between one man and one woman. As a senator, Clinton backed civil unions and partner benefits for same-sex couples, and came out in favor of same-sex marriage in 2013, shortly before the Court struck down a key provision of the 1996 law.

But the former secretary of state's attacks on Republican hopefuls were not limited to same-sex marriage.

Reacting to the other landmark decision by the Supreme Court this week, Clinton said, "All the Republican candidates were furious that earlier this week the Supreme Court once again confirmed what we have all known and believed for years: (Obamacare) is settled law and it is here to stay."

In a 6-3 decision, the Supreme Court saved Obama's controversial health care law on Thursday, ruling that the Affordable Care Act was authorized to provide federal tax credits to states with federal marketplaces.

"Even after two Supreme Court verdicts and a presidential election, they are still fighting to take us backwards," Clinton said, referring to the 2012 Supreme Court decision on the issue and that year's presidential election. "I think we can sum up the message from the Court and the American people: 'Move on.'"

As she has in the past, Clinton said she doesn't think the health care law is perfect, pointing to drug and out-of-pocket costs as two areas that she says need to be addressed.

But she embraced Obama throughout the speech, and she applauded the way the President eulogized Rev. Clementa Pinckney, the South Carolina state senator who was killed along with eight others in last week's church massacre in Charleston, South Carolina.

She referenced the tragedy when she hit House Republicans for voting on Wednesday to put restrictions on whether the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention can study gun violence and make recommendations.

"How can you watch massacre after massacre and take that vote?" she asked. "That is wrong. It puts our people at risk, and I, for one, am never going to stop fighting for a better, safer approach to get the gun violence in this country under control."

Friday's event was meant to focus on the successes of Virginia Democrats -- including longtime Clinton friend and Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe. But as the program went on, the event started to feel like a Hillary for America rally.

Rep. Bobby Scott said he was happy to welcome "the next President of the United States of America to the commonwealth of Virginia." Sen. Tim Kaine said, "I'm so excited we get to be here to welcome Secretary Clinton, our next President." And Sen. Mark Warner added, "I don't know about you, but I made my choice. I'm ready for Hillary."

McAuliffe, Clinton's 2008 campaign chairman, was even more effusive, to the point of getting personal.

"Folks, let me say this, this is personal for me," he said. "I have known Hillary for decades. We have worked hard together, we have played hard together."

The famously blunt governor went on to tell the audience that when he and his wife travel with Bill and Hillary Clinton and the governor wants a drink, "I don't go looking for Bill Clinton. I go looking for Hillary Clinton, because she is a lot more fun that Bill Clinton."

McAuliffe described Clinton as a fighter who has "been knocked down" but gets up every time and "gets right back in that arena again."

"And yes, after 239 years," he concluded, "it is time for a woman President of the United States."

Clinton weathers the summer of Sanders // CNN // Jeff Zeleny – June 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton always insisted she wasn't expecting a coronation in her second presidential bid, but a single-digit lead over Bernie Sanders was surely not what she had in mind.

It's now clear that Clinton, despite a raft of political advantages that make her the envy of rivals from both parties, faces a stubborn obstacle in her quest to win the Democratic nomination.

She must weather the summer of Sanders.

Her once commanding and comfortable lead in New Hampshire has narrowed to 8 points, according to a new CNN/WMUR New Hampshire Primary poll. Sanders, a senator from neighboring Vermont, has emerged as the leading progressive alternative to Clinton, consolidating support from Democrats who had been clamoring for Elizabeth Warren to enter the race.

An early sense of curiosity surrounding Sanders, who is drawing Obama-size crowds to his campaign rallies, is now translating into actual support for his candidacy.

"I think we are probably doing a lot better than you would have thought two months ago when we got into this, right?" Sanders said in an interview. "Clearly, what I do know, is the stronger that I get, the attacks are going to come from all kinds of sources."

Yet don't expect those attacks to start coming from Clinton, at least not directly.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Clinton campaign, which has been carefully tracking the Sanders momentum for the last month, has no immediate plans to go after Sanders. Taking an aggressive posture could not only elevate him even more in the eyes of liberals, it could also backfire and create deep divisions inside the Democratic Party that she is still far more likely than not to lead.

Several Democrats close to the campaign, even some who have been underwhelmed by the first three months of her candidacy, tell CNN that Clinton and her team are far from panicking.

Clinton plans response to Sanders

But Clinton does intend to respond to Sanders -- and the progressive wing of her party -- in a far more nuanced way this summer. She intends to take several steps, including:

 Escalating her direct challenge of Republicans, increasingly calling them out by name, in an effort to cement her image as a fighter for Democratic interests. There's nothing more energizing to Democrats than a few well-honed attacks on Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio, Scott Walker and the rest of the Republican field.

 Delivering a series of policy speeches throughout the summer, amplifying her call for social and economic issues that animate progressives. She intends to tackle college affordability, women's pay equity and paid family leave -- among other issues -- in hopes of making her candidacy more acceptable to voters who may be more inclined to favor Warren or Sanders.

 Campaigning aggressively in Iowa and New Hampshire, the first two contests in the primary fight, to demonstrate that she knows she must work hard to capture the Democratic nomination and will put in the work needed to win over any skeptical liberals.

Clinton struggles on empathy question

Since jumping into the race, Clinton has struggled to persuade voters that she is empathetic. The latest New Hampshire poll shows 45 percent say Sanders is the candidate who cares the most about people like you, compared with 24 percent who believe Clinton is.

Sanders, a political independent who proudly calls himself a socialist, is heading to New Hampshire for a weekend campaign swing to try and expand upon his early support.

So far, he has avoided directly going after Clinton, mentioning her by name only when asked by reporters. His aides say he has no plans of changing that strategy.

"What I am doing is, in fact, speaking to issues that are in the hearts and the minds of the American people in a way that is a little bit bolder than other candidates have in the past," Sanders said in an interview. "And I think people are responding to that."

The New Hampshire poll shows that many Democrats are responding favorably to Clinton's candidacy, including 74 percent who say they have a positive impression of her. She also is more trusted to handle the economy and health care, two of the leading domestic issues in the contest.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton has been spending considerable time in June raising money, eyeing the first campaign fundraising deadline next week. A series of interviews with local Democratic leaders in New Hampshire and Iowa suggests there is a hunger among party activists for more -- not less -- of Clinton.

Desire for a contest

There is also a hunger for a competitive primary fight.

"There are two kinds of groups," said Jean Pardee, the Democratic chairwoman in Clinton County, Iowa. "There are those who are concerned that Hillary's baggage will keep her from winning. There is another group who likes the blunt, outspoken answers that Bernie Sanders gives."

Pardee and other party leaders say the growing interest in Sanders is only a warning sign for Clinton.

"As of now, I don't see it as a problem," Pardee told CNN. "I think it will make her and her staff work a little more carefully and harder. They certainly won't take anything for granted, as in 2008 they did."

State Department: It's 'Hard To Know' How Many Other Emails Hillary May Have Failed To Turn Over //
Daily Caller // Chuck Ross – June 26, 2015

A State Department spokesman admitted it's "hard to know" how many work-related emails former Sec. of State Hillary Clinton failed to turn over to the agency.

"We don't know the degree to which there may be other emails that another third party may have — in this case Mr. Blumenthal — that we do not have," State Department spokesman John Kirby told reporters at a press conference Friday.

He was responding to Thursday's bombshell revelation that the agency did not have 15 Libya-related emails sent between Clinton and her longtime friend, Sidney Blumenthal. Blumenthal turned over 60 emails he sent to Clinton when she was in office. He provided the records to the House Select Committee on Benghazi last week.

In doing so, it quickly became apparent that Blumenthal's emails included some exchanges which Clinton had not turned over to the State Department in December.

That despite Clinton's confident assurance at a press conference in March that she "provided all…emails that could possibly be work-related" to the State Department.

Kirby mostly dodged reporters questions on Friday but was forced to admit the State Department has no way to determine how many other official government emails Clinton failed to turn over.

Cornered by a reporter about whether the discrepancy revealed in the Blumenthal emails indicates Clinton failed to turn over other records, Kirby said: "it would appear to be so."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Unless you have another inventory to check it against, like in this case we had Mr. Blumenthal’s emails, it’s hard to know,” Kirby said.

“We only knew about these 15 because Mr. Blumenthal had them and provided them to the Select Committee so there was something to check it against,” he added.

“I couldn’t possibly hypothesize about what other email traffic that might relate to Benghazi or Libya that we don’t have.”

Clinton has made it all but impossible to figure out just how many official records she failed to turn over. She has said her team went through her email account and picked out work-related emails and deleted the rest. Her attorney has also indicated to the Select Committee the personal server she used to maintain the email account has been wiped clean. That attorney, David Kendall, has also said Clinton will not turn over the server.

In his comments, Kirby took off the table the one sure way of knowing whether Clinton has been telling the truth. He said that the State Department has no plans to ask Clinton for her private email server. He also said the agency will not undertake an investigation into Clinton’s email gap.

No probe over undisclosed Clinton emails, State says // The Hill // Martin Matishak – June 26, 2015

The State Department says there won't be an internal investigation into why the agency couldn’t find part or all of 15 emails from former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton’s personal email server.

“I know of no such investigation, certainly not by the State Department, no,” State Department spokesman John Kirby said during a Friday press briefing.

Clinton’s former agency found it lacked the communications following the House Select Committee on Benghazi’s release of nearly 60 emails it had received from Clinton adviser Sidney Blumenthal earlier this month.

“We were clear about that in our communication with the committee that of the 15 that we did not have, that Mr. Blumenthal had, they were not specifically related to Benghazi, which was the original mandate on the select committee,” Kirby said.

“Again, we only knew about these 15 because Mr. Blumenthal had them and provided them to the select committee, so there was something to check it against,” he told reporters. “We don't know the degree to which there may be other emails that another third party may have, in this case, Mr. Blumenthal, that we do not have.”

Earlier this year, Clinton, a 2016 presidential candidate, gave her old agency around 30,000 emails from the private server she used while serving as the nation’s top diplomat.

Clinton’s attorney later said all data stored on the server has been destroyed.

The missing memos all predate the Sept. 11, 2012, siege on the diplomatic outpost in Benghazi, Libya, that killed four Americans, but the select committee seized on the discovery as another sign Clinton has not been forthcoming about her State Department tenure.

“This confirms doubts about the completeness of Clinton's self-selected public record and raises serious questions about her decision to erase her personal server — especially before it could be analyzed by an independent, neutral third party arbiter,” panel Chairman Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.) said in a statement Thursday night.

He said the revelation "is significant and troubling” and “has implications far beyond Libya, Benghazi and our committee's work.”

“This conclusively shows her email arrangement with herself, which was then vetted by her own lawyers, has resulted in an incomplete public record,” Gowdy said.

Kirby said the emails “would appear” to be work-related, thus meeting the benchmark for Clinton set for herself before turning them over.

But he said it’s not up to the State Department to determine how the emails were initially missed.

“That would be a matter between the select committee and former Secretary Clinton,” Kirby said.

Clinton Is Going To Take Fire on Iraq and Benghazi from Democrats, Too // Foreign Policy – David Frances – June 26, 2015

The 2016 Republican presidential field long has poked at two of Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton’s most visible political vulnerabilities: her 2002 vote for the Iraq war, and the 2012 attacks against the U.S. consulate in Benghazi, Libya, that killed Ambassador J. Christopher Stevens. A speech from a member of her own party suggests Democrats will also target those Achilles’ heels.

In a Friday speech outlining his foreign policy, former Maryland Governor and Democratic presidential candidate Martin O’Malley pointedly mentioned Iraq and Benghazi. Speaking at the TruCon 2015 conference, he didn’t mention Clinton by name, but it was clear his arrows were aimed toward the former senator and secretary of state.

“We must recognize that there are real lessons to be learned from the tragedy in Benghazi,” O’Malley’s said. “Namely, we need to know in advance who is likely to take power—or vie for it—once a dictator is toppled.”

Later, he said, “The invasion of Iraq—along with the subsequent disbanding of the Iraqi military—will be remembered as one of the most tragic, deceitful, and costly blunders in U.S. history.“

“We are still paying the price of a war pursued under false pretenses and acquiesced to by ‘the appalling silence of the good,” he said.

O’Malley’s foreign policy adviser, Doug Wilson, denied the his boss was trying to frame the debate with Clinton. “You see no mention of candidates’ names in what he had to say. This was not a speech about Hillary Clinton,” Wilson told CNN.

But O’Malley didn’t mention Iraq and Libya by accident. His statements on the war in Iraq and Benghazi lays the groundwork for future avenues of attack for Democrats trying to unseat Clinton from her perch above the rest of the field. His other comments on foreign affairs issues like Iran and the Islamic State largely toed the Democratic line.

Republicans are taking the same tack as President Barack Obama did in 2008 — going after Clinton's vote as a New York senator to authorize the Iraq war. They also refuse to let the Benghazi issue die. O'Malley's comments show the issue is also fair game in the Democratic primary, even though a 2014 GOP House investigation found Clinton had done nothing wrong.

It's clear this week, despite no wrongdoing, that the scandal has yet to breathe its last breath. In May, Clinton released hundreds of pages of emails related to Benghazi from a private Internet server she used from home while still serving at the State Department. On Thursday, the State Department announced that all or part of 15 email exchanges between Clinton and her long-time adviser, Sidney Blumenthal, were missing. Conspiracy-minded critics pounced.

"This confirms doubts about the completeness of Clinton's self-selected public record and raises serious questions about her decision to erase her personal server — especially before it could be analyzed by an independent, neutral third party arbiter," Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), chairman of the House Select Committee on Benghazi, said Thursday.

A batch of 15 newly disclosed Hillary Clinton emails appears to contradict her assertion last month that memos about Libya she received from an old friend while she was U.S. secretary of state were "unsolicited."

Clinton did not hand over the emails to the State Department last year when she provided the agency with what she said was a complete record of her work-related emails, the department said on Thursday night.

The disclosure that the record was incomplete, for reasons that remain unclear, has added to criticism of the favorite to become the Democratic Party's nominee for the 2016 presidential election.

Political opponents say Clinton side-stepped federal record-keeping and transparency laws by using a private email server in her home for work-related correspondence. The Republican Party said on Friday it was renewing its demands that Clinton relinquish the server to be examined.

"Greetings from Kabul!" Clinton wrote in one of the newly disclosed emails in July 2012, in reply to a memo on the Libya election from her old friend and informal adviser Sidney Blumenthal. "And thanks for keeping this stuff coming!"

Blumenthal was barred from a job at the State Department by aides to President Barack Obama because of lingering distrust over his role advising Clinton's run against Obama in the acrimonious 2008 Democratic primary, according to the New York Times.

A Clinton spokesman did not immediately respond to questions about whether the newly disclosed emails undercut Clinton's comments at a campaign stop in Iowa last month on her relationship with Blumenthal.

"He's been a friend of mine for a long time and he sent me unsolicited emails, which I passed on in some instances," Clinton said of Blumenthal in May.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a March 2012 email, Clinton replied to an email from Blumenthal about possible French and British actions in Libya. "This strains credulity based on what I know," she wrote to Blumenthal. "Any other info about it?"

In a third example, she thanked Blumenthal for sending her intelligence about the Libyan National Transitional Council in August 2011 ahead of a meeting with NTC leaders. "I'm going to Paris tomorrow night and will meet [with National Transitional Council] leaders so this and additional info useful," she told him.

Clinton has seen her trustworthiness ratings erode after the revelations in March about her unusual email habits while she was the nation's top diplomat.

She used a single private email account for all her personal and work correspondence, connected to a computer server kept in her New York home, an arrangement that she said broke no rules.

In March, Clinton deflected accusations of undue secrecy by saying she had "absolute confidence" she had given any emails that could possibly be work-related to the State Department, including all that mentioned Libya. She later called for the entire cache to be made public.

It remains unclear why Clinton apparently did not include these 15 emails when she handed over her records in December, and whether there are other omissions yet to be made public.

State Department spokesman John Kirby said on Friday the department did not know if other emails were missing.

The undisclosed emails first came to light after a Republican-led committee of U.S. lawmakers investigating the 2012 attack on diplomatic staff in Benghazi, Libya, obtained Blumenthal's record of the emails through a subpoena.

Clinton did include a number of emails between her and Blumenthal in her disclosure last year. Some of those had already been made public, but none of those included examples of Clinton actively encouraging Blumenthal's correspondence.

Nick Merrill, a Clinton spokesman, said Clinton had provided the State Department with all the work-related correspondence she had in her possession. He declined to say whether emails had been deleted from Clinton's private server at an earlier date, prior to the department's request.

Blumenthal could not be reached for comment.

Hillary Clinton TBT: 'Marriage Is Between A Man And A Woman' // Inquisitr – June 26, 2015

A Hillary Clinton TBT message has been making the rounds on Friday via Facebook, and it's casting a shadow over her celebration of the same-sex marriage Supreme Court victory.

First, I'll start with Clinton's reaction to the momentous decision of five Supreme Court Justices to legalize same-sex marriage in all 50 states.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As you can see, it was quite the celebration, but it was also something that she did not support while her husband was in office.

First, the Hillary Clinton TBT meme that has conservative America, in particular, buzzing.

The Wall Street Journal dug up the full quote from the frontrunner for the 2016 Democratic nomination in a piece entitled, "Hillary Clinton's Long Road to Supporting Gay Marriage."

"Her evolution has largely tracked public opinion," writes WSJ's Tim Hanrahan. "As the country has gotten more comfortable with same sex marriage, Mrs. Clinton's opposition has softened."

In 1996, he points out, her husband, President Bill Clinton, signed the Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA) defining marriage as a union between one man and one woman.

So there is no saying that Hillary held a different view from her husband, he also includes this quote, which she gave while running for the U.S. Senate in 2000 for the state of New York.

"Marriage has got historic, religious and moral content that goes back to the beginning of time, and I think a marriage is as a marriage has always been, between a man and a woman."

And here's some video from 2004.

Nevertheless, Clinton has been a pretty strong supporter of marriage equality during the campaign trail.

But what do you think, readers? Is the Hillary Clinton TBT attack fair? Is Mrs. Clinton just saying what she thinks everyone wants to hear, or is it possible her support is legitimately held? Sound off in the comments section.

Al Gore: 'Too early' to back Hillary Clinton // Page Six // Emily Smith – June 26, 2015

Al Gore declined to back Hillary Clinton for president when asked who he thinks would be next in the White House.

When questioned by WPP founder Sir Martin Sorrell at the Cannes Lions festival of creativity about whom he would back for 2016, Gore — Bill Clinton's vice president from 1993 to 2001 —notably didn't take the chance to praise Hillary.

In a packed Cannes Lions session Friday, Sorrell asked Gore, "Would you refuse to answer the question [who will be the next president of the United States]?"

Gore responded, "I wouldn't refuse to answer that question, I would try to cleverly dodge the question … I would say it's actually too early."

Gore merely smiled, but didn't comment further, after Sorrell added, "I think Hillary will win and it would be great to have a female president of the most powerful nation on the planet."

Gore has reportedly had a complicated relationship with the Clintons since 2000. Political insiders speculate Gore may be remaining neutral for now but would eventually back the Democratic nominee.

Gore last October described Hillary in an interview with Bloomberg as an "extremely capable person," adding she did an excellent job as secretary of state and a New York senator. But he also said it was too early and "I am not going to engage in horse race analysis before the horses even go to the gate."

The former vice president used his speech at Cannes to call on the ad and creative world to help him in his fight against climate change. When asked about climate deniers, Gore said it was a campaign run by polluters and compared their actions to the tobacco industry, which employed actors posing as doctors to reassure consumers that smoking was safe: "It was deeply unethical, immoral, destructive, really evil, and that is exactly what the climate denial industry is doing."

Gore believes global warming would be a big issue at the next election: "The age of fossil fuels is beginning to end … years ago a Saudi minister once said, 'The stone age didn't end because of a shortage of stones.'"

But he blasted lobbyists and special interests for blocking reform: "American democracy has been hacked … the US became the world's leader by making better decisions than any other nation … the role of money really degraded the decision-making quality in the US.

"Big sources of special interest money are able to prevent the passage of almost any meaningful reform in the public interest, it really pains me to say … That has had a cascading impact on the ability of the US to continue providing the thought leadership to the world as a whole.

"It is urgent not only for the interests of the US but for the future of humankind … that the US find ways to quickly restore its ability to make decisions based on its best values and to limit the corrupting impact and degrading impact of lobbying and campaign contributions."

When asked if he thought the Obama administration had "lost traction," Gore continued that presidents have been constrained by Congress, and "The most serious dysfunction in American democracy is now in the legislative branch, in Congress, because they spend most of their time begging rich people and special interests for money."

Urging the world's most powerful ad executives and creatives to join him in the fight against climate change, he added, "Please help … this is for real."

During the session, Gore also poked fun at Sorrell's headline-grabbing salary. After Sorrell, who heads the world's biggest ad agency and earned $66 million last year, stated, "I am an expert in renumeration," Gore joked, "I think I read about that every year." And when Sorrell kept interrupting him with questions, he quipped, "Your mind is so active, Martin."

There were also laughs when Gore talked about his $14 billion venture capital firm Generation Investment Management, founded in London with David Blood, and Sorrell asked, "You weren't going to call it Blood and Gore, were you?"

Sorrell ended the interview by asking which was the more honest TV portrayal of life in the White House, "The West Wing" or "Veep." Gore shot back, "You are leaving out 'House of Cards'?"

The former vice president added, “I think Julia Louis-Dreyfus is an absolute comedic genius, I was honored that she came and asked for some advice before their first season, then again second season. But one of my former speechwriters was a writer on ‘West Wing,’ and I think both shows have been fantastic.” But he added, “‘House of Cards’ — for the most part — should not be taken literally.”

Hillary Clinton’s Achilles Heel: Trust // Fiscal Times // Eric Pianin – June 26, 2015

While Hillary Clinton remains the odds-on favorite to capture the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, the former secretary of state continues to be dogged by questions about her honesty and integrity.

After a steady stream of negative reports about dubious fundraising by her family’s global foundation, the tens of millions of dollars that she and former President Bill Clinton raked in giving speeches to colleges and special interest groups, and the controversy over her use of her private email account to conduct official business during her four years at the State Department, recent polls show that doubts about her credibility may be her Achilles heel.

The Washington Post and other news organizations reported Thursday that Clinton withheld from the State Department at least 15 emails related to the 2012 terrorist attack on a U.S. diplomatic mission in Benghazi, Libya – once again calling into question her contention that she had handed over her complete public record.

The discrepancy came to light several days ago after a House special panel investigating the Benghazi tragedy that led to the death of four Americans subpoenaed former Clinton White House adviser Sidney Blumenthal’s records. After Blumenthal turned the emails over to the panel, the State Department said on Thursday that it could not locate “all or part” of the emails among the 55,000 pages messages from a private server Clinton used while in office.

“This confirms doubts about the completeness of Clinton’s self-selected public record, and raises serious questions about her decision to erase her personal server -- especially before it could be analyzed by an independent, neutral third-party arbiter,” Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-SC), chairman of the Select Committee on Benghazi.

A Washington Post-ABC News poll earlier this month shows that the number of people who view Clinton as honest and trustworthy has dropped from 53 percent a year ago to just 41 percent now. Slightly more than half now don’t see her as honest and trustworthy.

Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, a self-described Democratic socialist, is steadily gaining ground on Clinton in the early primary battleground states of Iowa and New Hampshire, with the latest CNN/WMUR Granite State Poll showing Sanders trailing Clinton in New Hampshire by just eight percentage points, 43 percent to 35 percent.

A Bloomberg Politics/Saint Anselm Poll conducted June 19-22 shows Clinton leading Sanders in Iowa 50 percent to 24 percent and in New Hampshire by 56 percent to 24 percent. That represents a six- to eight-point increase in his support since those states were polled by Bloomberg in May.

As Bloomberg noted, with nearly identical support in Iowa and New Hampshire, Sanders’ rise in the polls suggests that his appeal goes well beyond his populist, anti-Wall Street message, and that voters are giving him higher marks than Clinton on “authenticity” and integrity.

A tireless Clinton ran until the end // Boston Globe // John C. King – June 26, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The candidate was speaking in a hoarse, raspy voice. Late at night, behind schedule again.

I was leaning on a table in the back of the room, straining to hear and scribbling notes.

“The man is a HOSS. A HOSS. Just a . . . HOSS!! You got to understand what we are seeing here.”

Gennifer Flowers and allegations of marital infidelity. A newly released 1969 letter in which Bill Clinton called the Vietnam draft “illegitimate.”

“It seals his fate,” then-US Senator and Clinton rival Tom Harkin told me when I asked him about the draft letter.

Clinton’s poll numbers were tanking, and Democratic circles buzzed with talk that the Arkansas governor was toast and perhaps Governor Mario Cuomo of New York or Senator Lloyd Bentsen would enter the race to save the party.

My bosses suggested returning to Washington as the best option to track all the rumors and rumblings. I begged to stay: I wanted to see whether one man’s remarkable personal tenacity was enough to defy political gravity.

The language and lessons of that tumultuous 1992 primary stand out most among seven cycles of cherished New Hampshire memories that I covered for the Associated Press and later for CNN.

The campaign began with the Clintons confident. His “Putting People First” economic plan promising jobs and a middle-class tax cut was welcomed in a state that was struggling. The Democratic field was not considered all that strong.

Clinton’s Southern roots and lexicon brought a bit of head scratching. Like when the candidate compared critics to “pigs squealing under a gate” or questioned the timing of political attacks by noting, “if you see a turtle on a fence post, chances are it didn’t get there by accident.”

But those same Southern roots fit the Clinton narrative: This was not a Northern liberal like Michael Dukakis or Walter Mondale; the pro-death penalty governor gave Democrats a chance to win the White House.

In the heady days, Hillary would introduce Bill, who would then brag New Hampshire and the nation were about to get “two for the price of one.” But as 1991 gave way to 1992, and the first-in-the-nation primary was drawing near, confidence gave way to crisis. Crises, to be more accurate.

On Super Bowl Sunday, the Clintons traveled from New Hampshire to Boston to sit side by side on a hotel suite couch for an interview with CBS’ “60 Minutes” to brush the Flowers allegations aside.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I have acknowledged causing pain in my marriage,” said Bill Clinton, declining to offer details.

“I’m not sitting here like some little woman, standing by my man like Tammy Wynette,” Hillary Clinton said. “I’m sitting here because I love him.”

Again, I was next to Carville, the Clinton campaign strategist. This time he was silent, hanging on every word of the interview, gasping at one point when a light stand began falling toward the Clintons.

I was there because the Clintons had agreed to an Associated Press interview after the CBS taping. We began in the elevator down to the lobby, the Clintons holding hands, and continued in the car en route to Logan Airport.

“They bought and paid her,” Hillary Clinton said of Flowers and the Star tabloid.

Bill Clinton was more sympathetic.

“There have been a lot of victims in this process and maybe she [Flowers] is one of them,” he said.

“Not any more,” his wife quickly retorted.

On the tarmac at Logan, they split — Bill Clinton headed back for events in New Hampshire; Hillary Clinton flew home to Little Rock to be with then 11-year-old Chelsea as her parents’ marriage became the flashpoint of American politics.

It was just one of many vivid memories of trailing Clinton in that New Hampshire campaign’s tumultuous final weeks. There were late nights with impromptu stops, including one Friday, as midnight approached, opening the door of his second VFW post in an hour.

“This place must be OK — they’ve got Roy Orbison playing,” Clinton said with a smile . Once inside, he shook every hand and fed a quarter into the jukebox, pausing at Mariah Carey and ultimately selecting Patsy Cline.

Another day it was what reporters dubbed a “death march” through a shopping mall. Even some of the governor’s aides surrendered to exhaustion and sat on the floor while Clinton looked for more hands to shake, more skeptics to convert.

Repeatedly, in speeches and one-on-one appeals, Clinton suggested the attacks on him were designed to steer the campaign away from voters and their economic anxiety.

One such appeal is now the stuff of New Hampshire primary legend, his promise — delivered in Dover — that if the voters gave him a second chance, “I’ll be there for you till the last dog dies.”

He didn’t win, but he declared his second-place finish evidence he was 1992’s “comeback kid.”

Covering Clinton in those days was to experience “Survivor” long before the age of reality television, and he always remained grateful to New Hampshire.

On Inauguration Day 2001, after handing the White House over to George W. Bush, Clinton flew home to Little Rock, and invited a few reporters who had been there in the early days of the 1992 campaign along for the ride.

The conversation was full of memories of Dunkin' Donuts, the loyal band of Clinton New Hampshire supporters, and the roller coaster final weeks.

"That was wild," the now former president said on that nostalgic flight. "I love that place."

O'MALLEY

O'Malley lays out foreign policy vision // MSNBC // Alex-Seitz-Wald – June 26, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley laid out his foreign policy vision in his most extensive remarks on international affairs to date at the Truman Project, a progressive national security group in Washington, D.C., on Friday.

As a former governor of Maryland, O'Malley has arguably less direct foreign policy experience than his Democratic rivals. Front-runner Hillary Clinton served as secretary of state, while the rest of the field served in the Senate, which has a constitutional role in making and approving foreign policy.

But O'Malley was the first declared Democratic presidential candidate to give a traditional speech exclusively on foreign policy, and he used the remarks Friday to bolster his credentials and to subtly distinguish himself from Clinton.

The former governor called for a more holistic approach to national security — which he argues should go beyond typical military threats to include dangers like climate change, infectious pandemics, droughts, and cybersecurity. And traditionally economic issues like immigration and energy policy should also be viewed as key national security concerns, he added.

After years of war, "it's understandable that many Americans would like to disengage from the world around us. That's understandable, but it's not responsible," he said. He detailed a range of threats to the U.S., including the so-called Islamic State, which he called "a gang of murderous thugs who have perverted one of the world's great religions."

The U.S. national security structure, which was created after World War II, was organized in a way that did not account for these modern-day threats. O'Malley called for a "new National Security Act," the Truman-era law that made sweeping reorganizations of the basic structure of the military in 1947.

"Development, defense, diplomacy; they all stand together as equal parts of our national security – or at least they should," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley drew on his experience as governor where possible, discussing his work on combating various threats and calling for training National Guard troops to take a lead on cybersecurity in the U.S. homeland. "Critical infrastructure remains extremely vulnerable to hackers," he said.

But he also acknowledged that he had more learning to do. "This time is not exclusively for questions! If you have answers, we would really like to hear your answers," he quipped at the start of a question-and-answer session, which was open only to participants and not the press.

While he never mentioned her name, O'Malley drew some apparent contrasts between himself and Clinton.

The Iraq War, which Clinton voted to approve in the Senate, "will be remembered as one of the most tragic, deceitful, and costly blunders in U.S. history," he said. The former governor added that the war would not have been possible without the "appalling silence of the good," quoting Martin Luther King Jr.

He even invoked the Benghazi terror attack, which occurred under Clinton's watch, but retreated from the issue quickly. "There are real lessons to be learned from the tragedy," he said.

O'Malley's campaign denied that his comments were a veiled rebuke of the Clinton. "This was not a speech about Hillary Clinton and the State Department," O'Malley's senior foreign policy adviser Doug Wilson told reporters afterwards.

Wilson is also the chairman of the board of advisers for the Truman Project.

"This governor has traveled. He has met with foreign leaders. He has met with [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu," Wilson said, of O'Malley's foreign policy credentials. "So I think he feels that he has qualifications in this area. He may not be a Bookings Institution policy wonk, but he is somebody who has a sense of the realities of the world."

Proving foreign policy chops is a challenge familiar to every governor who runs for president. But American nonetheless tend to nominate and elect governors for the presidency more often than senators or candidates from other jobs.

The Truman Project, which trains many young progressive foreign policy operatives, invited all Democratic presidential candidates to speak. Top Clinton policy aide Jake Sullivan will speak Friday, but not on behalf of the campaign. Vice President Biden, who is still considering a presidential run, spoke Thursday evening.

SANDERS

Bernie Sanders's Early Online Haul: $8.3 Million // NYT // Derek Willis – June 26, 2015

The enthusiastic crowds that have been greeting Bernie Sanders on the campaign trail have been matched by online donor excitement.

Mr. Sanders, the socialist Vermont senator running for the Democratic presidential nomination, has raised at least $8.3 million online through June 17, according to Federal Election Commission records. His campaign won't file its initial report until July 15, but filings by ActBlue, the online fund-raising committee that serves as a conduit for Democratic campaigns, show that Mr. Sanders has brought in more money in May and the first half of June than any other Democratic candidate using ActBlue.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's likely that Mr. Sanders will report more than $9 million raised as of June 30, the deadline for midyear F.E.C. reports. That amount is larger than any Republican not named Mitt Romney raised in the first half of 2011.

His total is greater than that of Martin O'Malley, the former Maryland governor who also uses ActBlue and has collected more than $331,000 in his first month of online fund-raising. But Mr. Sanders's online success is likely to be eclipsed in the first set of filings by Hillary Rodham Clinton, who has a larger network of donors and more time to raise money. (ActBlue is not Mrs. Clinton's primary online fund-raising vehicle; she has received at least $43,000 through ActBlue users between April 20 and June 17).

On April 30, the day Mr. Sanders announced his candidacy, he generated more than $1 million via ActBlue. He got $1.6 million on May 3. Not counting those two largest days, on average ActBlue users sent $177,598 to Mr. Sanders each day between May 4 and June 17.

Without the support of a "super PAC," Mr. Sanders's total may seem small compared with some of the other 2016 candidates, but anywhere close to $10 million would be a very respectable total for a candidate who raised a total of $6.2 million for his 2012 Senate race. One question is whether this initial flood of donations represents the high-water mark or can be sustained.

Unlike candidate filings, ActBlue's F.E.C. reports don't make for easy browsing, because they often include tens of thousands of rows on a spreadsheet detailing millions of dollars of contributions. And absent special congressional elections in Mississippi, New York and Illinois, ActBlue would not have needed to file its own report until next month. But because of those races, we get a glimpse of donor support for Mr. Sanders.

This Is Bernie Sanders' Plan to Beat Hillary Clinton // Mother Jones // David Corn – June 26, 2015

It's fortunate for Hillary Clinton that Sen. Bernie Sanders, the independent socialist from Vermont who is challenging her for the Democratic presidential nomination, despises and eschews negative advertising. That's because the political consulting firm that Sanders has retained to advise his campaign has a well-developed expertise in devising attack ads. Earlier this year, this outfit, Devine Mulvey Longabaugh, won a Pollie award from the American Association of Political Consultants for creating the best Democratic congressional ad of 2014. The spot slammed Dave Trott, a Republican running for a congressional seat in Michigan, for making millions of dollars by foreclosing on residents of his state, and it focused on the harrowing eviction of a 101-year-old Detroit woman. Trott survived this assault and handily won the seat in the Republican district, but the Washington Post called the commercial "one of the most brutal attack ads you'll ever see."

The Sanders campaign has no plans to hurl these kinds of ads at Clinton. As Tad Devine, the veteran political operative who leads this firm and a longtime adviser to Sanders, notes, mudslinging is not part of the campaign strategy that Sanders and his advisers have crafted. There won't even be one speck of dust directly tossed at Clinton. But, Devine tells me, implicit negative messages aimed at Clinton will certainly be "embedded" in Sanders' advertising and social media messaging.

Sanders does have an overall plan on how to beat Clinton. As Devine explains, it goes something like this: Raise enough money to devote significant resources to building a full operation and maintaining a media presence in the early states of Iowa and New Hampshire, as well as Nevada and South Carolina. At the same time, develop a basic foundation for campaign organizations in other states, so if Sanders fares well in the initial contests, these preliminary outfits can quickly be built out. Devine and other Sanders advisers estimate they will need to raise $40-$50 million by the Iowa caucuses to be in such a position, and they claim Sanders is on track to hit that mark, mainly with thousands and thousands of low-dollar contributions. (Sanders has drawn crowds of thousands at recent campaign events.) "I don't know if we can outright beat her in Iowa and New Hampshire," Devine says, "but we have a real shot at it in both places."

And when—or if—that happens, Devine figures, Sanders will have about a million contributors already on his side, and this group will enthusiastically kick in more money to replenish Sanders' coffers and fund the continuation of Bernie-mentum. "I worked for Walter Mondale in 1984," Devine recalls, "but I saw what Gary Hart did." Hart, a former senator who went up against Mondale in a bid for the Democratic presidential nomination, placed a surprising second in Iowa and won New Hampshire. "Things then moved fast. Some polls moved 50 points in seven days," Devine says. (Mondale, though, did end up squelching the Hart insurgency by exploiting the Democratic establishment in key states.)

If Sanders does score well in the early states, Devine insists, his campaign will have a delegate-accumulation strategy reminiscent of the one Barack Obama's 2008 campaign employed to focus as much on snagging delegates as winning caucuses and primaries. "Even if Clinton beats us in some states by 20 points, we can split the delegates with smart focusing," Devine says. And then Sanders will be in a position to make the case to the Democratic establishment that he can assemble an electorate in the general election that is favorable to Democrats (as Obama did in 2008). "We don't know yet what it will look like," Devine remarks. "We haven't done the strategic modeling yet. I've been trying to persuade Bernie we should do that." Instead, he says, Sanders at this point would rather concentrate on promoting his message: Inequality is killing the middle class, climate change must be addressed, big-money politics must be reformed, and new progressive policy ideas, such as free college tuition and expanded Social Security benefits, must be advanced. (Devine also gave Sanders a PowerPoint presentation on how the campaign can use Big Data methods: "He was impressed, but we're not sure we can scale up to that. We won't have $1 billion.")

And what about Clinton? How will Sanders take her on?

Sanders recently boasted that he has "never run a negative ad," noting that he "hates and detests these 30-second negative ads." Devine says this is part of Sanders' DNA. "You need to know Bernie's history with negative ads to get this," Devine says. In 1988, when Sanders was the mayor of Burlington, Vermont, he ran for an open congressional seat as an independent and lost a close race to Republican Peter Smith. Two years later, Sanders was back to challenge Smith. In that 1990 race, Smith aired tough ads assailing Sanders, and Sanders' aides advised him to hit back. Instead, Sanders bought airtime for a five-minute spot in which he talked straight to the camera and decried the attack ads. (It didn't hurt Sanders that the National Rifle Association was slamming Smith for having voted for a ban on semi-automatic weapons.) Sanders ended up winning that race by 16 points. "This was his formative experience," says Devine. "Negative ads have to be denounced and jiu-jitsued."

During his 1994 re-election race, Sanders had a close call. He won by only three points. He responded by doing what he swore he would never do: He hired a Washington consultant, Devine. But he told Devine he would stick to his no-negative-ads stance. In the next election, Sanders aired only positive spots and won by 22 points.

Ten years later, Sanders ran for the Senate, with Devine still advising him. His Republican opponent was a millionaire businessman named Rich Tarrant who dumped about $7 million into the race in a state where, Devine says, no candidate had ever spent more than $2 million on a campaign. "It was a vicious campaign against Bernie," Devine recalls. "He ran ads that accused Bernie of supporting child molesters and terrorists. Chuck Schumer and Harry Reid were telling Bernie, 'You must respond.'" Sanders replied with an ad Devine had cut, in which Sanders noted he was being unfairly attacked and asked voters to visit his website to get the truth. Subsequent commercials by Sanders attempted to refute the stream of attack ads from Tarrant. The Sanders campaign also pushed an ad in which country singer Willie Nelson endorsed Sanders and cited his work for family farmers. Sanders beat Tarrant by more than a 2-1 margin.

So Sanders has survived and thrived in politics by neutralizing negative ads and resisting the urge to attack. And part of his shtick is that he doesn't do conventional politics. So, Devine notes, he will not directly criticize or poke at Clinton. For sure, no personal attacks or cheap shots. "That won't help him," Devine says. "He rejects the status quo of politics." Sanders won't even do a straight-up contrast ad—as in, Bernie Sanders believes X about subject Y, but Hillary Clinton believes Z. "If we do that, we're done," Devine says. "If we do a classic comparative ad, it's over. We'll have to be smarter."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And Team Sanders does have what it considers to be a smarter way: implying a contrast. In previous campaigns, Devine says, "We have constantly embedded contrast in everything we do." One example: During the 2006 Senate race, Tarrant's residence became a political issue because he had claimed a Florida mansion as his home for tax purposes. Sanders ran a biographical ad in which he declared he worked in Washington and lived in Burlington—an indirect jab at Tarrant. In the campaign against Clinton, Devine notes, "There will be a lot of implicit negative. But it won't look negative. It won't feel negative."

That's how Sanders recently handled the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade pact. He opposes the measure as a sop to corporate America and billionaires. Asked about Clinton's view—she has referred positively to this trade deal in the past but more recently has avoided stating a firm position—Sanders didn't proclaim that she's in bed with the 1 percent; he called on her to take a clear stance. "It's not a question of watching this," he said. "You're going to have determine which side are you on." Devine points out that "this is not negative, but contrasting. When you offer voters a contrast on the issues, they don't take that as a negative." He adds that Sanders is "very good at this."

Contrast without attacking—that's the mantra. "As someone making the ads, it will be a difficult challenge," Devine says. "We have to present the differences in the ads without him coming across as part of the political system." Devine fears that if Sanders crosses that line, the Clinton campaign will fire back hard: "They have all the tonnage. We're dead."

Bernie Sanders Is Enjoying a Mini-Surge // The New Yorker // John Cassidy – June 26, 2015

On Thursday, while the political world was focussed on the Supreme Court's Obamacare ruling, two polls came out showing Bernie Sanders making up ground on Hillary Clinton in New Hampshire and Iowa. In a survey carried out by the University of New Hampshire Survey Center for CNN and the Manchester-based WMUR TV, Clinton was leading Sanders by just eight percentage points: forty-three per cent to thirty-five per cent. Meanwhile, a poll carried out in Iowa for Bloomberg found that Sanders now has the support of about a quarter of likely Democratic voters, by far his strongest showing yet in the state that will be the first to vote in the Democratic primary. "It's tremendous progress that he is making with voters in the first two states," Tad Devine, Sanders's chief political strategist, told Bloomberg's John McCormick. "It's something we felt on the ground."

At this stage, it's necessary to issue a few qualifiers.

First, it's not July 4th yet, and there are still seven months until the 2016 primaries begin. At this early stage, opinion polls bounce around quite a bit, and no single survey should be accorded very much weight. Second, Clinton is trouncing Sanders in the national polls. Third, even in the early primary states she still has a big advantage. In Iowa, Sanders has yet to come within twenty-five points of her in any poll, and in New Hampshire a separate Bloomberg survey found that she retains a much bigger lead than the CNN/WMUR survey suggested: twenty-six points. "Clinton remains enormously well-known and well-liked in New Hampshire, a state she won before," Doug Usher, of Purple Strategies, the research firm that carried out Bloomberg's New Hampshire poll, said. "She benefits from a gender gap in a primary that will be disproportionately female, and even Sanders's voters admit Clinton is likely the nominee."

So there's no need for panic in the Clinton camp, which has adopted the public position that it expected a competitive primary all along. But for Sanders, and for Democrats who would like an alternative to Clinton, the signs are encouraging. The seventy-three-year-old Vermont senator is clearly enjoying himself, hurtling around the country, drawing large crowds, and promoting his progressive agenda. In the past few days, for instance, he has welcomed Pope Francis's encyclical on climate change, criticized Congress for granting President Obama fast-track authority to complete the Trans-Pacific Partnership, and reiterated his call to expand Medicare into a national health-care system for everyone.

As Sanders promised when he started out, he isn't criticizing Clinton directly. But he is seeking to draw a contrast between his clear positions on such issues as trade with his opponent's nuanced statements. And he's insisting he's in it to win. Speaking to David Corn, of Mother Jones, Devine explained that Sanders's strategy is based on raising enough money—forty or fifty million dollars—to advertise in the early primary states of Iowa, New Hampshire,

Nevada, and South Carolina, and he claimed that, thanks to lots of small donations, this strategy is working so far. "I don't know if we can outright beat her in Iowa and New Hampshire," Devine said, "but we have a real shot at it in both places."

That may be stretching things. Still, if Sanders keeps gaining, he will certainly have the capacity to disrupt some of the Clinton campaign's carefully laid plans. Should they go after Bernie? Should they ignore him? Something in the middle? Up until now, the Clintonites have been running a professional and highly scripted operation that has achieved most of its initial goals, but that sometimes resembles painting by numbers. Clinton has the money, the infrastructure, and the support from other prominent Democrats that Sanders lacks, but the Vermont senator has advantages, too: enthusiasm at the grassroots, the flexibility that comes with being a one-man band, and the ability to position himself as a scrappy underdog and outsider.

"You can make the case that a certain amount of Bernie Sanders's support is a protest vote, but there's more to it than that," J. Ann Selzer, the president of Selzer & Co, which carried out Bloomberg's poll in Iowa, said. "People like him. They like what he stands for. They like showing up at his events and hearing him say things they believe in." In short, Sanders is running a classic insurgency campaign. And as many establishment candidates have discovered in the past, running against such an opponent can be an uncomfortable experience.

Read Late 1970s Bernie Sanders' No-Holds-Barred Critique Of Mass Media // Buzzfeed // Andrew Kaczynski – June 26, 2015

In the late 1970s Bernie Sanders, then still known mostly as the perennial Liberty Union candidate and freelance writer, wrote a critique of mass media and television for the Vanguard Press, an alt-weekly that ran from the mid 1970s into the early 1980s.

In the critique, Sanders holds contempt for the mainstream media, which he said abided by the "well-tested Hitlerian principle that people should be treated as morons and bombarded over and over again with the same simple phrases and ideas."

Sanders noted three major functions of the television industry.

"First, it is supposed to make as much money as possible for the owners of the industry and for the companies who advertise," he wrote. "Second, like heroin and alcohol, television serves the function of an escapist mechanism which allows people to 'space out' and avoid the pain and conflict of their lives — and the causes of those problems. Third, television is the major vehicle by which the owners of this society propagate their political points of view (including lies and distortions) through the 'news.'"

Today, the socialist Vermont senator who is seeking the Democratic presidential nomination still views mass communication as an important issue facing the country. He maintains a page on his website where he notes, "media consolidation suppresses diversity and ignores the needs and interests of local communities."

The Vermont weekly Seven Days has dug deep in Sanders' history in the state, as a perennial candidate, mayor, congressman, and senator. A "Bernie Beat" archived details his record in the state coming back into the early 1970s. This article is among those posted in their extensive archives.

Sanders noted a "fundamental contradiction" in television like many aspects of a capitalist society. He said owners of the mass media industry don't want to educate people because "to do so would be to act against their own best interests."

"What the owners of the TV industry want to do, and are doing, in my opinion, is use that medium to intentionally brainwash people into submission and helplessness," wrote Sanders.

"With considerable forethought they are attempting to create a nation of morons who will faithfully go out and buy this or that product, vote for this or that candidate, and faithfully work for their employers for as low a wage as possible."

Sanders said if "the television industry encouraged intellectual growth, honesty, and the pursuit of truth, it would put most major corporations out of business." He noted "most advertising consists of lies designed to sell products which are either identical to the competition, totally useless, grossly overpriced, or dangerous to human health or the environment."

"The last thing that the owners of the TV industry would want is for people to know the truth about the products sold on the air," he wrote.

Sanders concluded by noting control of television is a political issue that is necessary to address for those "who are concerned about living in a democratic and healthy society."

Clinton backer has 'crush' on Bernie Sanders // The Hill // Judy Kurtz – June 26, 2015

Margaret Cho, a Hillary Clinton supporter, says she's got a "crush" on Bernie Sanders.

"I am in Hillary's corner," the comedienne told Larry King on his show, "PoliticKING," on Thursday, "although I have a little crush on Bernie Sanders. I think he's kind of great."

Cho told King that it's not the married Democratic presidential candidate's looks that hooked her, but rather, "I think he's very much about telling the truth. He's really talking about like, how this is all a race about money. It's just billionaires kind of comparing who's got the most money, and that's actually true when you think about the presidential race."

Despite her "crush," the outspoken entertainer and LGBT rights activist said she's "long been" a fan of Clinton: "I had a hard time sort of deciding between Hillary and Obama. I did go to the Obama camp eventually. But Hillary is great."

Cho, 46, added of Sanders' political rival, "Hillary's already been president for eight years. So she always knows the job. So she's cool."

The Vermont senator, Cho said, "may be pulling" Clinton to the left. "Sanders is very much to the left," she said. "He's kind of got this very different appeal."

Jeb Bush has a new problem: John Roberts // Politico // Eli Stokols – June 26, 2015

Jeb Bush is always facing nagging questions about the Bush family's political legacy. Now he's got another: John Roberts.

With conservatives up in arms over Roberts' role in preserving Obamacare, Jeb Bush suddenly finds himself called to answer for the chief justice appointed by his brother, George W. Bush. And not just Roberts — Jeb is also taking flak for David Souter, the liberal justice appointed by his father, George H.W. Bush.

In a radio interview Friday afternoon, Jeb Bush was pressed by host Hugh Hewitt to explain the Roberts and Souter nominations to disappointed conservatives.

Bush was reluctant to criticize the chief justice, preferring to talk more broadly about the need to appoint battle-tested conservatives to the high court after back-to-back rulings on Obamacare and same-sex marriage that delighted the left.

"I'm disappointed in both decisions," Bush told Hewitt. "It's important I think to think about going forward what kind of judges we need in the highest court in the land.

"When I was governor, we tried to find people with a proven record of judicial restraint, and people that were committed to enforcing the constitutional limits on government authority. In essence, what I'm saying is I think we need to have people that have not just theoretically, but have had a proven record of not legislating from the bench."

That's what conservatives thought they were getting in Roberts, who was appointed to his position by George W. Bush in 2005. After his majority opinion in King v. Burwell, which preserved Obamacare's tax subsidies, they're not so sure.

"It's fair to say conservatives are re-assessing their view of John Roberts," said John Andrews, the organizer of the Western Conservative Summit in Denver, where seven GOP presidential hopefuls will address 4,000 Republicans this weekend. "These rulings have sharpened the consciousness of conservatives about the importance of judicial appointments, for sure."

Three of the nine current Supreme Court justices were appointed by a Bush: George H.W. Bush appointed Clarence Thomas in 1991; George W. Bush tapped Samuel Alito and Roberts for two vacancies in 2005.

Conservatives couldn't be more pleased with Thomas and Alito. When it comes to the chief justice, however, it's a different story now that the Roberts Court has twice ruled in favor of Obamacare.

Following the court's 6-3 decision to uphold Obamacare subsidies on Thursday, Jeb Bush's campaign pointed the finger at the president, emailing his supporters with a fundraising pitch that argued, "This is the direct result of President Obama."

Hewitt, however, wouldn't let him get away with that line, noting that the decision itself came from Roberts, who wrote the majority opinion.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Is he still a model for you going forward?” the host asked Bush.

“I liked one of his rulings and I didn’t like the other,” Bush replied, referring to his agreement with Roberts’ dissent in the same-sex marriage case. “He is a person of unimpeachable integrity and great intelligence.”

Bush’s velvet-glove criticism of Roberts wasn’t nearly tough enough for a conservative base that loathes Obamacare.

“The biggest political loser in this decision was Governor Jeb Bush who can’t be trusted with Supreme Court nominations,” wrote the conservative publication Human Events. “The Bush family has packed the court liberals in conservative clothing. America can’t take the risk of another Bush making the same mistake.”

Hewitt reminded Bush about the justices appointed by his father and brother, specifically Souter, who’s no longer on the court. The now retired justice wound up siding mostly with the court’s liberal wing during his tenure and became a huge disappointment to conservatives.

Roberts, once beloved on the right and a jurist whom conservatives hoped would preside over the court for decades to come, is now drawing unfavorable comparisons to Souter for having ruled to uphold the Affordable Care Act — first by saving the individual mandate in the summer of 2012 and now by declaring the tax subsidies offered under the health law to be constitutional.

“All justices disappoint their presidents some of the time but Souter was like a 90 percent swing and miss,” Hewitt said. “How do you avoid Souters?”

“You focus on people to be Supreme Court justices who have a proven record of judicial restraint,” Bush answered.

Jeb Bush is heading to Charleston for a private meeting with pastors // Reuters – June 26, 2015

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Jeb Bush, a Republican contender for president, will sit down with pastors on a visit on Monday to Charleston, South Carolina, where nine African-Americans were shot to death at a historic black church, his campaign said on Friday.

Bush, the former Florida governor who leads many polls of Republican voters in the race for the party's 2016 presidential nomination, had canceled a planned campaign stop in Charleston a week ago when the shootings took place.

Instead of a campaign event, Bush will hold a private session with pastors from the Charleston community. In an attempt to keep the session low key, the news media will not be allowed in.

Bush has vowed to campaign in places where Republicans have not always gone in recent years, such as black churches and impoverished neighborhoods.

President Barack Obama gave a speech in Charleston on Friday about racial differences in the United States at the funeral for the Rev. Clementa Pinckney, who was among those shot to death.

Hillary Clinton, who is the Democratic frontrunner for president, was among those at the funeral on Friday.

While Florida governor, Bush engineered a move for the state to stop displaying the Confederate battle flag. A source familiar with the situation said Bush had consulted with South Carolina Governor Nikki Haley in the days before she announced an effort this week to remove the flag from the grounds of the state capitol in Columbia.

Jeb Bush Tries to Win Without Speaking to His Favorite Strategist // Bloomberg // Michael C. Bender – June 26, 2015

The singular failure of Jeb Bush's political career was his 1994 loss in the Florida governor's race by less than two percentage points. The defeat cast Bush, a rising Republican star, into the political wilderness just as his older brother, George, won an upset victory over Ann Richards in Texas, putting him on the path to the presidency. When Jeb ran again in 1998, he brought in Mike Murphy, an ad man credited with helping John Engler and Christine Todd Whitman win governorships in Michigan and New Jersey. Bush won by more than 10 points. He had Murphy at his side as he cruised to reelection in 2002. Now he's trying to win the presidency without his favorite strategist whispering in his ear.

Murphy is in charge of Right to Rise, a super PAC created to get Bush elected. Because of regulations requiring a separation between candidates and super PACs, they can't formally coordinate their efforts between now and the election. All the major candidates in the 2016 race will have super PACs working on their behalf, but Bush and Murphy are trying something unprecedented in U.S. presidential elections: building a separate, and better-funded, organization that will in some ways eclipse the official campaign as a vehicle for promoting the candidate. Murphy's Los Angeles-based team will produce digital marketing, television ads, and opposition research on behalf of Bush, whose campaign headquarters are across the country in Miami. "He's a good friend, and I'm going to miss him," Bush says. "I hope to see him on election night and give him an embrace. But from here on out, I won't be talking to him."

Unlike the campaign, the super PAC can accept unlimited contributions. Bush spent the months before announcing his candidacy on June 15 taking in tens of millions of dollars for the group, which will report how much it's raised in mid-July. He has been the featured guest at least 39 times for Right to Rise fundraisers, according to invitations compiled by the Sunlight Foundation. The list includes events where the suggested donation was $100,000 a person in Chicago, Miami, and New York. Going forward, he'll be allowed to appear at the group's events as a guest, but he can't discuss strategy or coordinate with Murphy directly.

For Murphy, who declined to be interviewed, the setup offers some clear benefits. For one thing, he'll be the autonomous ruler of the super PAC staff, free of the office politics of the campaign. He plans to use his own Virginia-based consulting company, Revolution Agency, to produce TV ads and a digital marketing effort to reach voters via social media and text messaging. In a June 17 conference call with donors, Murphy said he was no longer coordinating with the campaign but was "well informed as of a week ago" about Bush's strategy. He said Right to Rise would focus on fundraising this year, holding on to most of its cash until primaries begin in early 2016—though Murphy said Right to Rise would "do a few frugal, highly targeted things to help boost the governor's narrative" this summer, as the candidate travels around the country meeting voters.

The call, which was reported by BuzzFeed, illustrates the limits of the no-coordination rules. In the midterms, candidates and super PACs devised numerous tactics for telegraphing their strategies. One was tipping off mainstream news organizations to ad buys or strategic shifts. American Crossroads, a major Republican super PAC, and other groups used Twitter to share polling data with party committees, posting tweets filled with cryptic strings of data—in one case from an account named for a West Wing character. Aides to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee tweeted a link to ad scripts devised by New Hampshire Senator Jeanne Shaheen's campaign that were used by Senate Majority PAC, the largest outside Democratic group. "If Bush's chief strategist is doing conference calls to lay out exactly what the plan is and how that's part of the campaign, then there is no independence," says Bill Burton, a co-founder of Priorities USA, a Democratic super PAC created in 2012 to support President Obama's reelection that's now working for Hillary Clinton. (Burton is no longer involved.) "That's not to suggest Mike Murphy and the Bush campaign or anyone is breaking the laws. It's just that the law is

Bush says his campaign and Right to Rise are on parallel tracks. "I don't think we're exporting any responsibilities," he says. The campaign already has staff on the ground in Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire, and South Carolina. Right to Rise staffers have been trailing Bush and his events for months, stockpiling footage for ads. "The super PAC? We'll see what they do," Bush says. "I hope it enhances the message that I hope to bring."

Bush's top adviser on the campaign is Sally Bradshaw, who has been working with him since his father's presidential campaign in 1992. Murphy, who also worked on the 1992 campaign, is a foil for Bush, who sometimes struggles to tell a joke but has a keen appreciation for the role humor can play in buoying or tanking a campaign. In the 1998 governor's race, when Bush faced off against a Democrat named Buddy MacKay, Murphy came up with a simple tag line: "He's not your buddy." The line, or a version of it, was used in every possible ad. "That's a great example of Mike's creativity," says Cory Tilley, a Tallahassee political operative who handled communications for Bush in his Florida races. "That took the edge off some so it didn't look like a down-in-the-gutter attack." One TV spot accused MacKay and Florida Democrats of being soft on crime because they'd relaxed sentencing laws to address prison overcrowding. "Thanks, Buddy," said a burglar in the commercial.

Along with Bradshaw, Murphy has been able to tell Bush when he's strayed off course—or help him regain focus after campaign setbacks. "Murphy is one of the few people that Jeb can hear that from and believe it," says Brian Crowley, a Florida political analyst.

Nuclear 2.0? Jeb Bush is Open to Ending the Senate Filibuster to Repeal Obamacare // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur – June 26, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush said Friday he's open to eliminating the Senate's 60-vote threshold if it helps Congress repeal Obamacare and enact "free-market oriented" health care reforms.

Appearing on Hugh Hewitt's radio show, the former Florida governor was asked if he'd support invoking the "Reid rule"—also known as the "nuclear option"—to nix the legislative filibuster to replace the Affordable Care Act.

At first, Bush said his focus was coming up with a health care plan that Republicans can unify behind.

"I think we Republicans first need to unify behind the replacement," he said. "If there's unity there, we can act. Right now, though, for the last few years we've been organized against Obamacare... But there hasn't been any kind of unity about what the alternative is and that's what my focus is."

Hewitt pressed Bush, pointing out that Republicans are unlikely to get 60 Senate to defeat a filibuster if Democrats stick together and block efforts to repeal Obamacare, as they have done for years. "At that point," Hewitt said, "would you at least be open to making the argument that on this issue, before it gets its tentacles too deep, that we break the filibuster and ram through a repeal and replacement?"

Bush responded that he was open to it.

"I'd have to see—if the repeal is what I'm going to advocate, then I might consider that," he said, adding that if the replacement includes high-deductible, low-premium catastrophic coverage and helps the middle class, "then I would certainly consider that."

Bush is unique among presidential candidates who have signaled any openness to ending the legislative filibuster.

Democrats ended the 60-vote threshold for nominations to the executive and judicial branches (except the Supreme Court) in November 2013, drawing fierce conservative pushback. Since then, Republicans have preserved the change but have not sought to further dismantle the filibuster.

Even Senator Ted Cruz of Texas—a rival Republican candidate who is no stranger to supporting scorched-earth legislative tactics—wouldn't support the idea of scrapping the filibuster in February 2015 as he was pushing legislation to overturn President Barack Obama's immigration executive actions.

RUBIO

Rubio pushes back against health care ruling, new gun control efforts, and negotiating with terrorists // NH1 // Paul Steinhauser – June 26, 2015

EXETER – Marco Rubio says "I believe Obamacare's bad for Americans. Bad for the country."

Asked by NH1 News about the Supreme Court's ruling Thursday upholding the Affordable Care Act, the senator from Florida and Republican presidential candidate said "I disagree with their decision."

"I think a better approach is the one we're pushing for, and that is a patient centric, consumer centric, Obamacare replacement that would allow individual Americans to buy health insurance of the kind they want from any company in any state in America that would sell it to them," he added.

Rubio spoke to NH1 News and other news organizations outside the historic town hall in Exeter, minutes after the high court's ruling. Rubio was in Exeter to headline an event hosted by the conservative organization Concerned Veterans for America.

Asked by NH1 News about new gun control efforts in Congress in the wake of last week's horrific shootings at an historic black church in Charleston, South Carolina that left nine people dead, Rubio said "I think it's ineffective and it won't achieve what we're trying to achieve, and that's keeping guns out of the hands of criminals. Criminals don't care what the law is. That's why they're criminals."

Rubio's visit came one day after President Obama announced a policy overhaul that will allow the United States government to communicate and negotiate with hostage takers. Noting that his administration has too often failed the families of Americans taken hostage by groups like ISIS, the President said that the new rule "does not prevent communications with hostage takers by our government, the families of hostages or third parties who help these family."

But Obama said he wouldn't change a longstanding policy against paying ransoms to terrorist groups.

Rubio said he disagrees with the President, adding that "we have to understand that when you negotiate with terrorists, you are in essence incentivizing them to take more hostages in the future. You place other Americans, including service men and women, in danger."

Rubio's come under attack recently by Donald Trump, a rival for the GOP nomination. Asked by NH1 News about Trump's comments and whether the real estate mogul and reality TV should be taken seriously, Rubio said "I'm going to focus on my campaign and my message."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“One of the reasons Barack Obama is president of the United States today is because Republicans in the last election spent an inordinate amount of time attacking each other and calling each other names. We’ll have disagreements on policy. I look forward to that debate. But my message is going to be about the future of America. I’m not running against any other Republican,” he added.

Earlier, during the Concerned Veterans for America event, Rubio gave the President an F grade when it comes to the overhaul of the troubled Veterans Affairs department.

"It’s not just a funding issue, it’s not even ‘a want to’ issue, it is the fact that the model itself may not work in the 21st century,” Rubio said.

“The key is, it’s up to the veteran to choose,” Rubio added. “Putting the veteran in charge. If you don’t do that, you’ll have failing grade no matter who the president is.”

This was Rubio’s first trip to the first-in-the-nation primary state in two months. But top Rubio campaign officials told NH1 News to expect to see a lot more of the candidate in the Granite State going forward.

Rubio calls for preserving American dream // Eagle-Tribune // Doug Ireland – June 26, 2015

SALEM, N.H. — Florida Sen. Marco Rubio called for a 21st-century approach to solving the nation's problems during a town hall meeting Thursday at the Derry-Salem Elks Lodge.

Recalling his Cuban parents' struggle to make ends meet after coming to the United States in 1956, the Republican presidential hopeful said the nation's next leader must make sure Americans have the same opportunities to succeed as they did.

"The answer to why I'm running for president is really about my family," he told the crowd of nearly 150 people. "Their life wasn't an instant success. They struggled."

Rubio said his parents — a bartender and a maid — were able to better themselves through hard work.

"They were able to retire with dignity and security, and they were able to leave their four children better off than them," Rubio said. "There was no goal out of reach because we were Americans."

But he said many low-income Americans no longer have the opportunities to succeed like his parents did because of a soaring national debt and uncertain economic climate.

Rubio called for programs and policies that boost job growth and training for workers. A simpler tax code and less government regulation are also needed, he added.

"We have to make it easier to open a business," Rubio said. "We have wiped them out because of these regulations."

He spoke of the need for a child-tax credit to help working families, and said programs such as Medicaid and Social Security need to be improved and preserved.

Fishing for votes, Rubio turns attacks into jokes // Boston Herald // Chris Cassidy – June 26, 2015

SALEM, N.H. — Florida U.S. Sen. Marco Rubio turned the press attacks on his personal finances into punch lines while campaigning here yesterday — including a New York Times report that he "splurged" on an "extravagant ... luxury speedboat."

"Probably the most stunning argument I've heard recently from our friends in the press is that I'm not rich enough to be president of the United States," Rubio said to laughs during a town hall. "And, look, it's true I don't have a family foundation that's raised $2 billion, some of it with foreign donors ... But Jeanette and I have been blessed ... we've been able to buy a luxury speedboat, cleverly disguised as a fishing boat."

The Times story earlier this month claimed Rubio had been splurging on luxuries even though he was "bedeviled by financial struggles." A Politico report the next day revealed the "luxury" ves-sel was an $80,000 fishing boat he bought after receiving a book advance.

Rubio hit the Granite State for the first time in several weeks, appearing at two town halls in Exeter and Salem and delivering a policy speech in Manchester.

He also met briefly with five Massachusetts Republican lawmakers in Salem — state Senate Minority Leader Bruce Tarr, state Sens. Vinny deMacedo and Ryan Fattman and state Reps. Shawn Dooley and Keiko Orrall.

All but Tarr say they are definitely supporting Rubio and plan to campaign for him on both sides of the border.

"I'll come up to New Hampshire if needed," Dooley said. "Our focus will be to deliver Massachusetts for him. I don't think this will be a campaign season that will be won or lost in New Hampshire. Massachusetts will play a factor in the primary."

Michael Dewitt, a former 2012 Mitt Romney staffer from Meredith, said he's "90 percent" leaning toward Rubio but also considering Jeb Bush and Scott Walker.

"He was easily the coolest, most down-to-earth guy that we had dealings with," Dewitt said of his encounters with Rubio on the Romney campaign. "I've seen a lot of politicians, and a lot of them are just full of ... themselves. He's very articulate. He's very well-versed on the issues. He's very passionate about ... the country and where we're going."

Dubya's Real Brother Is Rubio // The Daily Beast // Tim Mak – June 26, 2015

MANCHESTER, N.H. -- What if George W. Bush's real brother -- ideologically, at least -- is Sen. Marco Rubio?

Rubio barnstormed the Granite State Thursday, bringing with him a campaign stump speech that was heavy on the compassionate conservatism and deeply hawkish foreign policy closely associated with Bush 43.

The Florida senator can embrace George W. Bush's message and rhetorical stylings -- higher defense spending and domestic policies that will appeal to conservatives but targeted at lower-income Americans -- but with the personal authority to speak about the poor in this country. And he can do it without the dynastic baggage that fellow 2016er Jeb Bush brings to the presidential contest.

The Republican Party hasn't seen compassionate conservatism in a while. During the heyday of the Tea Party movement, Republicans around the country decried Obama as a food stamp president and demanded drug testing for welfare recipients. Former GOP presidential candidate Mitt Romney came off as apathetic to the poor, and his "47 percent" comments cemented his reputation as a heartless plutocrat in the minds of many voters.

But Rubio grew up the son of a bartender and a maid, both immigrants. He has a mortgage -- just one -- that he and his wife pay on the fifth of every month. The Florida senator can speak with familiarity about being poor -- which couldn't be said of Romney, a gazillionaire memorably described by Mike Huckabee as “the guy who fires you”; John McCain, the son and grandson of admirals; and George W. Bush, the son of a president.

There are a lot of negative connotations in being compared to George W. Bush. But with Bush's approval rating recovering with the passage of time, Rubio brings a new face -- and new personal authority -- to an older perspective on conservatism.

"We have to reinvigorate our economy, and that begins with recognizing the plight of millions of Americans who today live paycheck to paycheck," Rubio told a small group of New Hampshire voters at the Derry-Salem Elks Lodge Thursday. "Do you know why I'm a conservative, why I love free enterprise? Because it's the only economic model in the history of the world where people like me even have a chance."

And Rubio’s emphasis on increased defense spending and a renewed willingness to use America’s military might abroad is also reminiscent of George W. Bush. Asked by an attendee what he would do in his first 100 days in the White House, Rubio's first three off-the cuff ideas were about national security.

"I would immediately ask Congress for a supplemental budget authority to increase defense spending," Rubio said. It was a topic he hammered over and over again: "We need a strong America on the global stage, because nothing else matters if we're not safe. And that starts with having the strongest military in the world. Today we are eviscerating our military, we have had rapid reductions in defense spending... We can't solve all the world's problems, but we can always be on the side of moral clarity."

But the capital-B, capital-I Big Idea that Rubio is campaigning on is that the things that guaranteed middle class stability and opportunity for the poor in the 20th century no longer work today. Touching on subjects ranging from social security to whether a college education will guarantee a job to the Veterans Administration, Rubio held three town halls in New Hampshire, all of which touched on how to improve the lot of the less well off.

"One of the fundamental issues that I've been campaigning on is the argument that the 21st century is dramatically different from the 20th, that things that used to work in the past don't work as well now because the world has changed," Rubio said at a Concerned Veterans for America event, where he urged reforms to the VA system broadly, Tri-Care military health insurance, and the vets' disability claims process.

Rubio also wants to reform the higher education system. He wants more students to pursue technical degrees, and college credit to be more easily granted for students with prior work experience or military service. A military service member who served two tours in Iraq shouldn't be made to sit through a course on modern Middle Eastern politics, he said.

"In the 21st century it is not enough to just have a college degree," Rubio said. He wants college loans to be granted only after colleges tell each student the average annual wage for the major and degree that they've chosen.

Many of the other ideas are fundamentally the same as 2000s conservatism: tax cuts for small businesses, increasing the child tax credit for working families, and reversing environmental regulations that hinder economic growth.

"The more people you hire, the more you pay them, and the more you expand -- the less you will owe the IRS. We need a tax code that allows businesses to immediately [reinvest] back into their employees," Rubio said.

His style impressed some of the locals, many of whom consider it their civic duty to put presidential candidates on the hot seat.

"His off-the-cuff remarks: he's moving up on the electability scale. He's sliding up," said Jorg Dreusick, a veteran from Pelham, New Hampshire who placed Rubio near the top of his list of top five presidential contenders. He attended both the morning event in Exeter, N.H. and the early afternoon event in Salem, N.H.

One thing Rubio simply didn't do while campaigning in New Hampshire: he didn't toss the crowd the red meat they really wanted. He got the largest applause out of one crowd when he spoke about Benghazi ("incompetence") and about President Obama ("who has chosen to divide us against each other, for [the] purpose of winning elections"). But those lines were responses to questions raised by the crowd.

Unlike some other presidential candidates, who thrive on the raucous response of the conservative primary audiences, Rubio didn't pander. Asked for his priorities as president, he geeked out on the proper role of the National Security Council, an issue unlikely to resonate with vast swaths of the electorate. Then he said he wanted centralized cybersecurity procedures so that agencies use best practices to protect information.

He even went out of his way to take a little shot at someone the many Patriots fans in attendance surely consider a hero.

"Tom Brady, when is he going to retire?" he asked the New Hampshire crowd.

Rubio among lawmakers vowing to repeal Obamacare following Supreme Court ruling // Fox News Latino – June 26, 2015

Thursday's Supreme Court ruling validating federal health insurance subsidies for nearly 6.4 million Americans had consumers breathing a sigh of relief that they would be able to afford their policies, but the reaction was markedly different from governors and lawmakers in states that have fought against the Affordable Care Act.

Many of them strengthened their calls to repeal the act, setting the tone for what will likely be a common GOP refrain during next year's presidential campaign.

Florida would have been ground zero for the aftermath, with more than 1.3 million people relying on the federal subsidies. Setting up a state exchange was a political non-starter. Republican Gov. Rick Scott and House Republicans strongly opposed a Senate bill that would have created one as well as expand Medicaid.

Scott and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, a Republican presidential candidate, both reaffirmed their commitment to repealing the law Thursday.

"It's a bad law," Scott told reporters. "It's made promises after promises."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Texas, like many of the 34 Republican-led states relying on the exchange, had no backup plan if the court had struck down the subsidies. Texas Gov. Greg Abbott had no interest in setting up a state exchange for the 832,000 Texans relying on the federal tax credits that lowered their monthly premiums.

"The Supreme Court abandoned the Constitution to resuscitate a failing health care law," Abbott, a Republican, said in a statement. "Today's action underscores why it is now more important than ever to ensure we elect a President who will repeal Obamacare and enact real health care reforms."

He and other GOP governors said it would have been up to the president and Congress to fix it.

At issue in the case were the subsidies given by the federal government to consumers in the 34 states that relied on the federal health insurance exchange. A handful of words in the Affordable Care Act suggested the subsidies were to go only to consumers using exchanges operated by the states. In its 6-3 ruling, the high court said those subsidies did not depend on where people live.

The court's decision to allow the subsidies to continue was a relief to many who had purchased health insurance policies through the federal exchange.

Among them is Jennifer Greene, a 58-year-old from Boca Raton, Florida, who feared she would have to go without insurance if she lost her $547-a-month tax credit.

She had insurance through her job at a large grocery store chain but lost it because she missed too much work following surgery to remove part of her colon, which required lengthy follow-up care.

Greene signed up for a mid-level insurance plan in February, paying $25 a month after the tax credit. She was able to keep her primary care doctor and has relied heavily on the insurance to cover follow-up appointments with specialists and a hernia surgery.

"Those things are not affordable without insurance," she said Thursday. "Having the insurance makes the difference of staying healthy or ignoring your health issues."

With the coverage expansion under the law, about 90 percent of Americans now have health care. After the Supreme Court ruling, the focus will shift to those who remain uninsured. But closing the gap will mean convincing some 20 states that have resisted the law's Medicaid expansion to drop their opposition.

The biggest payoff could come if Texas and Florida expand their programs, but governors and legislators in those states have blocked all Medicaid expansion efforts.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, a potential Republican presidential candidate, called on Congress to repeal and replace the law, saying Obama's signature domestic policy achievement had failed the American people. Some 183,000 Wisconsin residents are getting health insurance through the exchange.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, another potential GOP presidential contender, said in a Twitter message that "leaders must turn our attention to making the case that ObamaCare must be replaced."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Gov. Phil Bryant was among several Mississippi Republican leaders who criticized the Supreme Court's decision.

"Today's decision does not change the fact that Obamacare is a socialist takeover of health care forced down the throats of the American people without proper review, and it does not slow the massive and unprecedented transfer of wealth that is at the heart of the subsidy system," Bryant said.

Pennsylvania was one of the few states that had applied to set up a state exchange, but Democratic Gov. Tom Wolf said he would withdraw those plans given Thursday's ruling.

As the law's opponents regroup, consumers say they are grateful the court allowed the federal premium subsidies to continue.

Shawn Turner of Cisco, Illinois, finished chemotherapy for uterine cancer last summer and relies on the $830-a-month in tax credit she and her husband receive for regular follow-up scans to make sure the cancer is gone. If the court had struck down the subsidies, she said they would have had to dip into their savings or start selling their possessions to pay for their insurance.

"I'm just so relieved and happy, not just for me but for everyone who's being helped by this," said Turner, 55.

Cindy Williams, a 63-year-old breast cancer and liver cancer survivor from Texas, receives a federal premium subsidy of more than $500 a month. She said she would not be able to afford to go to the doctor or buy her medications without it.

Williams, who lives in the Austin suburb of Pflugerville, said she was thrilled to hear about the court's ruling.

"I am so happy because that means that I can keep my insurance, that I can stay healthy and move on with my life," she said.

Rand Paul: Clintons 'proud' to incarcerate a generation of black men // WaPo // Katie Zezima – June 26, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) said that Bill and Hillary Clinton were "proud" to be in power at a time when legions of young black men were put in prison as part of the war on drugs.

"Bill Clinton presided over the incarceration of an entire generation of young black men," Paul, a GOP presidential candidate, said Thursday on "The Wilkow Majority" on SiriusXM. Young black men, Paul said, are being put in jail "at a rate never before seen in history" because of the war on drugs.

"Hillary Clinton, Bill Clinton, they were all proud to do this, but now that I've been speaking out and saying that mass incarceration is the new Jim Crow, now all the sudden the Clintons are saying now we're going to be back on the other side of this issue now," he said.

Paul has long emphasized criminal justice issues, for example co-sponsoring legislation that would reform mandatory sentencing laws.

He pointed to poll numbers that showed him doing well against - or surpassing - Hillary Clinton in some swing states. A recent Quinnipiac poll, for example, showed Paul running even with Clinton in Ohio and ahead of her in Pennsylvania

"Someone from the DNC is listening to our radio interview now and they're looking for ways to attack me because they see me as a threat to Hillary Clinton," Paul said. "I'm going to the south side of Chicago, I'm going to the inner city Philadelphia, I'm going to Baltimore, I'm going to Ferguson and I'm saying what have the Democrats done for you? What have they done to alleviate poverty? What have they done on crime? What have they done for the young men in your community and you know what it's starting to gain traction."

Paul went to Chicago last month, spoke to the Baltimore County GOP earlier this month, and spoke at the Constitution Center and held a rally outside Independence Hall in Philadelphia last month.

Rand Paul Calls Mass Incarceration The "New Jim Crow" While Slamming Clinton // Buzzfeed News // Andrew Kaczynski and Megan Apper – June 26, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Rand Paul said Thursday that Bill and Hillary Clinton are "proud" to have presided "over the incarceration of a whole generation of young black men" in comments singling out mass incarceration as "the new Jim Crow."

The senator from Kentucky is an advocate for making changes to the criminal justice system and has co-sponsored legislation with Democratic Sen. Cory Booker to help keep nonviolent criminal offenders out of prison.

"Bill Clinton presided over the incarceration of a whole generation of young black men," Paul said on The Wilkow Majority. "We are putting young black men in jail at a rate never before seen in history and it's because of this war on drugs."

Paul said Hillary and Bill Clinton were "proud to do this."

Hillary Clinton spoke earlier this year of ending "the era of mass incarceration." Clinton's remarks rejected the "tough-on-crime" mantra and legislation advocated by her and her husband during his time as president which included signing the 1994 crime bill.

"And so Hillary Clinton, Bill Clinton, they were all proud to do this," said Paul. "But now that I've been speaking out and saying that mass incarceration is the new Jim Crow, now all of a sudden the Clintons are saying, 'oh wait a minute, we are going to be back on the other side of this issue right now.'"

Paul said Democrats saw him as "a threat to Hillary Clinton" because he goes to communities like Ferguson, Missouri and Baltimore, Maryland and says "what have the Democrats done for you?"

"And I hate to tell you this, but someone from the Democrat National Committee is listening to our radio interview right now and they are looking for ways to attack me, because they see me as a threat to Hillary Clinton, because I'm going to the south side of Chicago, I'm going to the inner city of Philadelphia, I'm going to Baltimore, I'm going to Ferguson, and I'm saying, what have the Democrats done for you? What have they done to alleviate poverty? What have they done for crime? What have they done for the young men in your community and you know why? It's starting to gain traction, and that is why we lead her in several states that Obama won."

Paul said he that understands marijuana isn't good for people, but the law needs to be fair and not incarcerate one race more than another.

"I think that the law needs to be fair and that we shouldn't incarcerate one race more than another and I think the law should be fair in the sense that the penalties should be proportionate to the crime," said Paul.

"You can kill someone in Kentucky and be eligible for parole in 12 years, but we have people in jail for marijuana sales for 55 years, life, 20 years, 25 years. We've gone too far in all of this and then when you add up the numbers, even the white kids and black kids use marijuana at about the same rate and in national surveys the arrests and incarceration rate is four times greater for black males than it is for white males."

Rand Paul's Tax Plan May Be Radical, But It's Not Impossible // Forbes // Joseph Thorndike – June 26, 2015

Last week Rand Paul unveiled his plan for the "Fair and Flat Tax." That makes him the latest – but certainly not the last – presidential candidate to embrace the rhetoric of flatness. If recent experience is any guide, it won't be an easy sell. Just ask Steve Forbes, Newt Gingrich, Rick Perry, or any of the other failed candidates who put flat taxes at the center of their campaigns.

A long view of history, however, suggests that flat taxes may have some legs. The United States has been using graduated rates for the federal income tax since 1913, but there's precedent for flat rate levies, too.

Congress has twice enacted single-rate taxes on income, the first in 1861 and again in 1894. Both disappeared before they were collected. But the debate surrounding their adoption — as well as the discussion in 1913 — reveals ample support for proportional, rather than progressive, taxation.

Confusing Polls

When it comes to taxes, "flat" is one of those words that often elicits favorable poll responses. Last yearReason.com reported that 62 percent of Americans endorsed the idea of a flat rate tax on income. Similarly,Rasmussen Reports found that 58 percent of respondents favored a flat income tax in 2011.

Other polls have been less encouraging. In 2011 The Hill found that only 35 percent of respondents supported a single-rate tax. Another 2011 survey found similar results. "Flat tax proponents face an uphill battle," observed David Brady and Tammy Frisby in a Wall Street Journal op-ed. "Americans in general opposed the flat tax proposal 39% to 28%."

If the polls are confusing, it's probably because the flat tax is confusing, too. There is no single definition of a flat tax. Politicians have used the term to describe a wide range of plans with little resemblance to each other. Some flat taxes are imposed on income, others on consumption. Some are flat in the sense that they wipe out all deductions, credits, exclusions, and similar tax preferences. Others – including Paul's – retain some popular (and costly) deductions, like those for mortgage interest and charitable giving.

A single rate would seem crucial for any tax claimed to be flat. But some flat taxes have featured graduated rates. Anyone remember the Fair Flat Tax Act of 2007? Don't let the name fool you; it was introduced not by Paul but by Democratic Sen. Ron Wyden of Oregon. Wyden, who now serves as ranking minority member of the Senate Finance Committee, made room in his outline for a series of graduated rates as well as some popular deductions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

However, almost every flat tax is rooted in arguments for less graduation in the rate structure. Even Wyden's plan would have slashed the number of brackets from six to three.

The hostility to graduation can seem nonsensical. After all, we've had a progressive rate structure for more than a century; it's obviously crucial to the tax system.

Or maybe not.

The 1913 income tax was not flat. It featured graduated rates ranging as high as 7 percent. But progressive rates were peripheral in arguments for adopting the tax. Supporters wanted to use the income tax to counterbalance regressive consumption taxes, especially the tariff. In general, they believed that even a flat rate tax would do the job.

"Graduated rates were not seen as essential to achieve the goals of an income tax," explained legal historian Steven Bank in a 1996 article on the origins of the flat tax. "The progressive rates were a response to the perception that the tariff was burdening the poor, in the form of higher prices, with more than their fair share of taxes." The thinking was that when levied with the tariff, the income tax would produce a relatively flat overall tax burden, he said. "Thus, consistent with the country's tradition, the income tax in the Act of 1913 was used to achieve the goal of a flat or proportionate rate tax system," Bank wrote.

Of course, rates increased rapidly after 1913. Just four years later, income in the top bracket was taxed at 77 percent. But for the most part, the income tax was viewed as a compensatory tax, designed to balance other, more regressive levies. In 1913 the tariff needed a counterweight. Today, it's payroll taxes.

Over the years, some left-leaning politicians have suggested using the income tax as a way to redistribute wealth or income. Franklin Roosevelt comes to mind. But more moderate (and numerous) politicians have defended the income tax as a way to redistribute the tax burden, with the ultimate goal being something close to proportionality.

Which brings us back to Paul's Fair Flat Tax. It's certainly radical and a sharp break with the recent past. As my colleague David Brunori has pointed out, it would reshape not just the tax system, but government as a whole, by starving the federal government of revenue.

But radical doesn't mean implausible. Since proportionality lies at the heart of Paul's plan, history suggests it might have a shot.

Rand Paul Is Winning the Pot Reform Primary // U.S. News & World Report // Steven Nelson – June 26, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul, R-Ky., is the favored candidate of leading marijuana reform advocates. Pot legalization is popular with young voters and likely will be on a half-dozen state ballots in 2016.

Sen. Rand Paul bested his rivals for the White House in a candidate report card issued Friday by the Marijuana Policy Project, one of the largest organizations pushing to regulate the drug like alcohol.

The group gave the Kentucky Republican an A- in recognition of his efforts to overhaul federal drug laws and his support of states' right to legalize marijuana.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Second place – a B+ – went to former Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va., who has not officially announced a bid, and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, a former Republican seeking the Democratic nomination.

Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, an independent also seeking the Democratic nomination, got a B, as did former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican who favors reducing criminal penalties.

MPP leaders have discussed formally endorsing Paul, and the group's political action committee this year contributed $5,000 to his presidential campaign, $5,000 to his Senate re-election bid and another $5,000 to a Paul-supporting PAC.

None of the other presidential campaigns have received funding from the group, which helped spearhead the successful legalization campaigns in Alaska and Colorado.

No serious contender has said they support legalization, despite majority support in many polls. Sanders and Chafee, however, have hinted they may evolve on the issue.

The Democrats' front-runner, Hillary Clinton, earned a B- in the report card for supporting states' right to legalize the drug and expanded research.

Many leading Republican contenders fared worse. Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, who supports state autonomy, got a C+. Businessman Donald Trump earned a C.

Former Gov. Jeb Bush, R-Fla., and Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., got a D, as did Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who is widely expected to seek the GOP nomination. Also earning a D was Vice President Joe Biden, who has not yet announced if he will seek the Democratic nomination.

Gov. Chris Christie, R-N.J., who has promised to end state-regulated recreational marijuana sales if he's elected president, earned an F.

CRUZ

After a tepid start to presidential run, Ted Cruz plans to 'play hard' in Iowa // WaPo // Katie Zezima – June 26, 2015

RED OAK, Iowa — Sen. Ted Cruz wound his way through the small towns and rolling hills of western Iowa last week, doing the gruntwork of retail campaigning: shaking hands, posing for photos, giving stump speeches and, most importantly: making entreaties for support in a state that could determine the trajectory of his presidential campaign.

"Whether we win or lose, this race will be decided by the men and women gathered here," he said last Friday to a group of mostly older people sitting on folding chairs in a conference room.

Iowa's first-in-the nation caucuses are often a high-stakes event for presidential campaigns — and this year the state is especially critical for Cruz, a stalwart conservative in a crowded field. The Texas Republican's uncompromising stances seem designed to appeal to the conservative base that dominates the state GOP, as well as the state's heavy concentration of evangelical Christians. On Friday in Sheldon, Iowa, Cruz forcefully denounced Supreme Court rulings upholding a key part of the Affordable Care Act and affirming the rights of gays to marry nationwide.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the early evidence suggests that victory in Iowa may be an uphill climb for the Texas senator.

Cruz's poll numbers in the state are underwhelming so far: a Des Moines register poll last month put him in eighth place among likely caucus-goers, with 5 percent saying they would support Cruz. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker was in first place with 17 percent of the vote. State Republicans have expressed surprise that Cruz, who has only one paid staffer in Iowa, had visited the state as an officially declared candidate just twice before last week's trip.

Now Cruz is doubling down on the Hawkeye State. Cruz is again making a swing through the state Friday. His last stop: a speech Saturday at Drake University in Des Moines, titled "Believe Again."

"I'm going to spend a lot of time in the great state of Iowa," Cruz promised more than a week ago at a restaurant in Denison, where a print of "American Gothic" hung on the wall behind him and a man rang a cowbell each time the senator made an applause line.

He has visited the state twice before as a candidate, with several more visits in the works over the coming weeks. He is vowing to visit all of Iowa's 99 counties, launching a fresh push to recruit key grass-roots volunteers and opening a campaign office soon.

"If Ted Cruz is your guy, I want to talk to you," Bryan English, Cruz's Iowa campaign chair, said to about 75 people who came to hear the candidate speak in Red Oak. They included the father of Sen. Joni Ernst (R-Iowa), who said he plans to support Cruz.

But Ernst herself — who took a very public motorcycle ride with Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) earlier this month — remains uncommitted. Other key state leaders have already signed on to other campaigns. And some here wonder why it took so long for Cruz to push this hard in Iowa.

Cruz went to Iowa a week after his announcement in March, and returned in April to attend a homeschooler conference in Des Moines. A third planned trip was canceled because of weather. He did not attend the Ernst event three weeks ago that featured many other GOP presidential hopefuls — including Walker — instead speaking at the North Carolina Republican convention. Cruz has also had to spend a large chunk of time in Washington, where the Senate has been in session.

"We haven't seen him," said Craig Robinson, a former Iowa Republican party political director. "It's one of those things where if he's going to be competitive here, and he has some stiff competition for the space he wants to occupy, he has to have a more constant presence in the state. You can't be gone for two months."

An Iowa Republican who did not want to be identified in order to speak freely was more blunt: "Ted Cruz can absolutely win the Iowa caucuses, but thus far he's not running the campaign that can do it for him."

In an interview Saturday, Cruz defended his strategy, saying much of the campaign's time and energy for the first few months had been focused on fundraising, on recruiting statewide leadership teams and on peeling away caucus-goers who once backed current presidential candidates, including Mike Huckabee, who won the state in 2008, and 2012 caucus winner Rick Santorum. Members of Cruz's Iowa team include former Iowa secretary of state Matt Schultz, who supported Santorum, and Joel Kurtinitis and state Sen. Jason Schultz, who both endorsed former Texas congressman Ron Paul during the last cycle.

Cruz said he is "playing hard" here – as well as New Hampshire, where he wants to appeal to Catholics, and South Carolina, where there are many evangelical Christians.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“If you look at our leadership teams you see conservatives, you see evangelicals, you see libertarians … I’m not aware of any other candidate that enjoys that breadth of support from the many groups that comprise the Republican majority,” Cruz said before an event at an indoor gun range in Johnston, Iowa.

Cruz advisers say that the candidate’s strategy is to coalesce his conservative base while pulling in support from evangelicals and conservative libertarians and casting aside what the candidate calls “the mushy middle.”

The campaign describes the electorate in a bracket-style system: conservatives, libertarians, evangelicals, and moderates. It believes Cruz’s path to victory involves winning the conservative bracket and getting large numbers of people in the evangelical bracket, as well as libertarians, to back his campaign.

But the biggest focus has been on fundraising. Cruz’s campaign raised $4 million in its first week and a collection of super PACs supporting the candidate have raised $37 million, according to CNN. The campaign itself said it is on pace to have raised $8 million to $10 million by June 30.

“In the early parts of a campaign, you cannot succeed without having the resources to communicate your message,” Cruz said.“There are seasons and phases in a presidential race.

“There are other candidates in the field who are not seeing significant fundraising success, who can spend every day doing nothing but grass-roots events because they’re not having success raising money,” he said.

Cruz’s campaign downplayed its minimal staffing in the state saying that its strategy all along has been to focus on recruiting the key, lesser-known grass-roots activists who can make inroads with his base, and to reach to conservatives who may not have voted in 2012.

“The era when a candidate could come move to an early state for a year, catch fire and then build a national campaign based on the momentum of that one state is no longer likely to occur because the time frame is compressed,” said Cruz. “And so we are also very deliberately running a national campaign.”

Cruz advisers said the candidate needs to win one of the first three primary states — or be in the top three in Iowa. Additionally, the campaign is pouring resources into states that will vote March 1 and March 15, a strategy they believe will position Cruz well after the crowded early primaries and caucuses shake out. Regardless of outcome, the campaign wants to be positioned to immediately dive into the delegate-rich second round of states, which includes Cruz’s home state of Texas.

“Our intent is to be standing” on March 15, an adviser said. Cruz will spend August stumping in states including Arkansas, Wyoming and Alabama. Cruz’s team also wants to try to solidify conservatives in more liberal states such as Massachusetts and Minnesota.

But Iowa Republicans believe the state is ripe for a candidate like Cruz. While Cruz advisers say they have solid teams in New Hampshire, where he has drawn large, rowdy crowds, and South Carolina, they are traditionally less friendly to a candidate, such as Cruz.

“I think Iowa is crucial for his candidacy,” Robinson said. “I’m surprised by his campaign strategy of saying we’re going to compete later on in the race and not go all in in Iowa. Iowa is a state where he can make his mark.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In this evangelical-dominated state, Cruz has the advantage of being able to deploy an evangelical pastor as a campaign surrogate: his father, Rafael. The elder Cruz has often drawn headlines for the wrong reasons — for instance, comparing President Obama to Fidel Castro. But he's been warmly received by many of the evangelical voters who made up 57 percent of Republican caucus-goers in 2012, according to entrance polls. He's been a steady presence here in Iowa, showing up at more than a dozen events across the state over a three-day period this month.

Cruz assailed against what he said are efforts to strip away religious freedom. He reaffirmed his promises to protect the Second Amendment, repeal Obamacare and abolish the IRS. He vowed to destroy the Islamic State, and ensure Iran doesn't acquire a nuclear weapon. And he described himself as the only candidate who is willing to take on anyone — Republican, Democrat or otherwise — to fight for his beliefs.

"If you look at the other candidates and ask on those issues on your list, where have they stood and led. What have they meaningfully done to lead on those issues?" he said in Denison.

Cruz paces around when delivering speeches and speaks with the cadence and zeal of a sermon. Here in Red Oak, he asked the enthusiastic crowd to imagine a president that won't allow Iran to have nuclear weapons.

"Scripture tells us there's nothing new under the sun," he said.

"We could if we could get you in there," a woman in the crowd said.

"Well, Amen, ma'am," said Cruz. "That's exactly what we're working to do."

Rick Perry Calls Supreme Court's Gay Marriage Ruling a Shame // KYFO // Justin Massoud – June 26, 2015

Former Texas Governor and 2016 Republican presidential candidate Rick Perry has accused the U.S. Supreme Court of ignoring the 10th amendment with its decision to overturn all gay marriage bans in the country.

"Regardless of what any court says, true marriage will always be between one man and one woman," said Perry via press release. "This truth is biblical and a super majority of Texans have affirmed this through the democratic election process. It is a shame that once again the Supreme Court has decided to ignore the 10th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution and decided to legislate from the bench and impose their will on the states."

The Supreme Court ruled in favor (5-4) of legalizing same-sex marriage Friday (June 26). Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Steven Breyer, Sonia Sotomayor, Elena Kagan and Anthony Kennedy were the majority opinion in the decision. Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas, John Roberts and Samuel Alito dissented.

The former Pennsylvania Senator and presidential candidate has long been an opponent of same-sex marriage and his response today was no different.

“Today, five unelected justices decided to redefine the foundational unit that binds together our society without public debate or input,” Santorum stated. “Now is the people’s opportunity respond because the future of the institution of marriage is too important to not have a public debate. The Court is one of three co-equal branches of government and, just as they have in cases from Dred Scott to Plessy, the Court has an imperfect track record. The stakes are too high and the issue too important to simply cede the will of the people to five unaccountable justices.”

The cases Santorum cited, Dred Scott and Plessy, are generally considered the most infamous in the history of the Supreme Court.

In Dred Scott v. Sanford, the Court ruled that Scott, a slave at the time in Missouri, could not sue for his freedom. Additionally, Chief Justice Roger Taney’s majority opinion asserted that African-Americans, whether then enslaved or free, were not American citizens and therefore had no legal standing.

The Dred Scott case is considered by historians as one of the major causes of the Civil War. It is unlikely today’s decision will lead to similar circumstances.

The Plessy v. Ferguson decision declared racial segregation as constitutional and created the “separate but equal” doctrine.

Santorum went on to state that he will lead the fight against the Court’s ruling that LGBT Americans have, as the Justice Kennedy put it, “equal dignity in the eyes of the law.”

“As President, I will be committed to using the bully pulpit of the White House to lead a national discussion on the importance to our economy and our culture of mothers and fathers entering into healthy marriages so that every child is given their birthright- to be raised by their mother and father in a stable, loving home,” Santorum concluded. “I will stand for the preservation of religious liberty and conscience, to believe what you are called to believe free from persecution. And I will ensure that the people will have a voice in decisions that impact the rock upon which our civilization is built.”

Justice Kennedy did address religious liberty, however, in his majority opinion.

The following is the last paragraph of section IV of Kennedy’s opinion:

Finally, it must be emphasized that religions, and those who adhere to religious doctrines, may continue to advocate with utmost, sincere conviction that, by divine precepts, same-sex marriage should not be condoned. The First Amendment ensures that religious organizations and persons are given proper protection as they seek to teach the principles that are so fulfilling and so central to their lives and faiths, and to their own deep aspirations to continue the family structure they have long revered. The same is true of those who oppose same-sex marriage for other reasons. In turn, those who believe allowing same-sex marriage is proper or indeed essential, whether as a matter of religious conviction or secular belief, may engage those who disagree with their view in an open and searching debate. The Constitution, however, does not permit the State to bar same-sex couples from marriage on the same terms as accorded to couples of the opposite sex.

Of course, Santorum’s statement was released just a half hour after the ruling was announced so it is possible he

HUCKABEE

Mike Huckabee rages at Supreme Court's marriage ruling: It's like repealing 'the law of gravity' // Business Insider // Colin Campbell – June 26, 2015

Presidential candidate and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (R) fumed at the Supreme Court on Friday after it legalized same-sex marriage nationwide.

"I will not acquiesce to an imperial court any more than our Founders acquiesced to an imperial British monarch. We must resist and reject judicial tyranny, not retreat," he said in a statement.

Huckabee, a former pastor and one of the most outspoken social conservatives in the 2016 race, urged elected officials not to "surrender" in the face of the ruling.

"This ruling is not about marriage equality, it's about marriage redefinition. This irrational, unconstitutional rejection of the expressed will of the people in over 30 states will prove to be one of the court's most disastrous decisions, and they have had many," he said. "The only outcome worse than this flawed, failed decision would be for the President and Congress, two co-equal branches of government, to surrender in the face of this out-of-control act of unconstitutional, judicial tyranny."

Huckabee also compared the ruling to repealing the law of gravity.

"The Supreme Court can no more repeal the laws of nature and nature's God on marriage than it can the law of gravity. Under our Constitution, the court cannot write a law, even though some cowardly politicians will wave the white flag and accept it without realizing that they are failing their sworn duty to reject abuses from the court," he continued.

The former governor also raged at the Supreme Court on Thursday after it upheld a critical component of the Affordable Care Act, also known as Obamacare.

FIORINA

Carson, Forrester endorse Fiorina's campaign // Concord Monitor – June 26, 2015

Two Republican state senators have voiced support for Carly Fiorina, the former CEO of Hewlett-Packard and one of the many GOP candidates for president.

State Sens. Sharon Carson of Londonderry and Jeanie Forrester of Meredith announced their endorsement in a press release from Fiorina's campaign Thursday.

"Carly's positive vision for unlocking the potential of our nation is appealing to me and so many others who have met her here on the campaign trail," Carson said in the release. "She is talking about what we can do as a nation, not dwelling on what we can't. It is time for an uplifting, real-world leader with the executive experience to tackle our challenges. That's Carly Fiorina."

Forrester called the candidate "a Washington outsider."

"Her life experiences come from the private sector, not government," Forrester said in the press release. "Like me, Carly has a business, charitable and nonprofit background and it is this background that has prepared her to lead our nation. She has accomplished much, knows what it is like to be held accountable and understands how to work with others to inspire change. I am pleased to be supporting her for president."

Carson echoed that support.

"Carly will bring a fresh perspective to Washington to roll back crushing regulations, simplify our onerous tax code and finally shrink the size and price tag of our federal government," Carson said in the release. "And she has specific ideas on how to do it: use zero-based budgeting to legitimize every federal tax dollar spent and cut waste; and leave vacant those federal jobs left by retiring baby boomers. She's serious about changing Washington for the better and I know she will be successful."

Kerry Marsh, the New Hampshire state director of Carly for America, said the campaign is very excited to have the senators' support.

"Senators Carson and Forrester understand, like Carly, that our nation is at a pivotal point," Marsh said. "Republicans must win the White House in 2016 to stop Washington from crushing our small businesses and holding back the potential of our citizens. Carly's personal story, her vision and her ability to connect with voters will give Republicans a real shot at winning in 2016 and our nation real hope for positive change."

Presidential hopeful Carly Fiorina woos, wows Colorado Republicans Denver Post // Lynn Bartels – June 26, 2015

Carly Fiorina told Colorado Republicans Friday morning she supports civil unions but not gay marriage, health care policy should be left up to the states and to let "The Donald go do what The Donald's going to do."

Fiorina, the former CEO of Hewlett-Packard and the only woman running for president in a crowded Republicans field, got her first round of applause when she talked about energy, which drives Colorado's economy.

"We should be, we could be, we must be, we will be, if I am president of the United states, a global energy powerhouse in the 21st century," she said.

Fiorina spoke at the Brown Palace in Denver at an event sponsored by RealClearPolitics. She also will address the Western Conservative Summit, which kicks off its three-day gathering in Denver on Friday. She received a warm reception — state Rep. Perry Buck, R-Windsor, cheered as Fiorina took the stage after being introduced by Carl Cannon, the Washington bureau chief for RealClearPolitics.

"I like her because she's not a politician," said Buck, who was one of a number of Republican state lawmakers who attended the event. "I like her business smarts and the economy is the most important thing. I do think she has some great international experience that I don't think some of the other candidates have."

Fiorina has taken on the Democrats' frontrunner, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, in various speeches since announcing in May she was seeking the GOP nomination for president.

Here's some of what Fiorina had to say:

GAY MARRIAGE

I support civil unions and I have for a very long time because I do not believe government can discriminate in any way. Everyone should be protected equally under the law. It's why I provided benefits to same-sex couples way back in 1999 when I came to Hewlett Packard.

On the other hand, marriage means something very specific. I do not think it is the purview of five people on the Supreme court, unelected and unaccountable, to think in their hubris that they have the power to change that. I hope that after this decision we will focus on preserving and protecting religious liberty because there are millions of people who disagree with this decision. I'm one of those people who believes marriage is between a man and a woman.

OBAMACARE

Whatever you thought of the Supreme Court ruling, set that aside. Here are the facts about Obamacare. The law itself was longer than a Harry Potter novel and not nearly as interesting. It was accompanied by tens of thousands pages of regulations. No one understands it. We need to repeal it because it's too complicated. My own view is we let states manage high-risk pools.

I'm a cancer survivor — I understand you can't bankrupt the families with pre-existing conditions. If people truly need help we need to give them that. (But the decision needs to be made) in the states, as close as possible to the people impacted by the decisions.

DONALD TRUMP

Let the Donald go do what the Donald's going to do. I'm going train my fire on Hillary Clinton, on the policies she is trying to lay out for this nation, and talk about why our values and our principles work better to unlock the potential of every American in this country.

THIS AND THAT

* I truly know from having lived and worked all over the world that only in this nation can a young woman start out typing and filing and answering the phones, go on to become the chief executive officer of the largest technology company of the world and run for the presidency of the United States.

* I'm not a professional politician but I'm not a political neophyte. I played a very active role in two presidential campaigns, I ran my own Senate campaign in the state of California. I spent last year helping other people win, including here in Colorado with Cory Gardner.

* Of course my business record is fair game. I led Hewlett-Packard for six years. It was a very difficult time. We had the dot.com bust, 9/11, the worst technology recession in 25 years.

CEO PAY, AN ISSUE RAISED BY CLINTON

You have to let shareholders vote on it and you have to be utterly transparent. Those were the rules that applied when I was the chief executive. I changed the rule so shareholders would vote on my pay.

But I don't hear Hillary ever saying a baseball player makes too much, a Hollywood mogul makes too much, my husband made too much when he got $500,000 for a speech, gee, it wasn't right that we accepted tens of millions of dollars from foreign governments while I was secretary of state.

CYBER ATTACK

How is is that the Office of Personnel Management couldn't manage to push back against a Chinese cyber attack. I've advised two secretaries of defense, a secretary of state, a secretary of homeland security. We have known without a doubt for at least 12 years that the Chinese were trying to hack into our federal government databases. Now we have 18 million people's most personal records in the hands of the Chinese. That, ladies and gentleman, is ineptitude.

Afterward, Fiorina received rave reviews.

"I'm pro Carly, very much so," said state Rep. Jack Tate of Cetennial. "I think she has a depth of intellect and a record of accomplishment that makes her stand out among all the candidates."

Debbie Brown with the Colorado Women's Alliance said, "I get more impressed every day." She also said she found it interesting that Fiorina doesn't shy away from the press.

Carly Fiorina: Marco Rubio is a 'politician with a great future,' 'would make a great veep' // Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 26, 2015

Former Hewlett-Packard CEO and 2016 GOP presidential candidate Carly Fiorina, asked for rapid-fire assessments of some of her Republican rivals, said Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida would be a good selection for a presidential ticket — but maybe not in the slot Mr. Rubio has in mind at this point.

During a Thursday evening appearance on Fox News' "Hannity" program, Ms. Fiorina said it's far more productive for her to be training her fire on former Secretary of State and 2016 Democratic frontrunner Hillary Rodham Clinton than on other Republican candidates.

"Some candidates are training all their fire on each other, and I think that's unfortunate, actually," she said.

But asked during a different part of the show for quick answers on some of the other 2016 GOP contenders, these were her responses:

On Mr. Rubio: "I think he is a politician with a great future. I think he would make a great veep."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky: "I think he is outside the mainstream of this party, and I think that we are a nation that must always [face] outward into the world. When we are not leading, which doesn't mean rushing off to war, the world is a far more dangerous and tragic place."

On former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush: "Jeb Bush is a very good man. I think that it's difficult for people to think about a Bush 3."

On Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (who has said he's been approached about a Walker-Rubio ticket, or vice versa): "Guy with a lot of grit — a lot of grit and a lot of heart. He has a very different experience than I do, which is a lifetime in Wisconsin politics."

On Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas: "Smart man — a very smart man. And I think that being president requires unifying the country."

On former Texas Gov. Rick Perry: "Rick Perry's a good friend of mine. Rick Perry got me to outsource a lot of manufacturing from California to Texas, as a matter of fact."

Ms. Fiorina and Mr. Rubio were actually tied for fifth at 6 percent in a CNN/WMUR poll released Thursday on the GOP field in the early state of New Hampshire.

Mr. Bush was in first at 16 percent, followed by businessman Donald Trump at 11 percent, Mr. Paul at 9 percent and Mr. Walker at 8 percent.

TRUMP

Creative Advice for Donald Trump, a 'Proudly Egotistical Showman' // NYT // Alexander Burns – June 26, 2015

In Fred Davis's imagination, a whole new Donald J. Trump would have announced for president last week: a softer, humbler version of "the Donald," with a common touch and a demeanor far removed from (in Mr. Davis's words) the "proudly egotistical showman" of reality television fame.

Mr. Davis, a top adviser and creative director to Senator John McCain's 2008 presidential campaign and known for his arresting television commercials, laid out his vision for overhauling Mr. Trump in a three-page memo last month to the real estate mogul's campaign manager.

"No braggadocio, no 757s or helicopters (as much as I love them), a different Mr. Trump would be portrayed," Mr. Davis wrote. "Remember this morning when you said he was really 'down to earth'? Right now that is simply unbelievable, it would be my job to make it believable and authentic."

That pitch was as far as things went: Mr. Davis now advises Gov. John Kasich of Ohio, another likely Republican presidential candidate.

In Mr. Trump's campaign kickoff last week, he eschewed humility entirely, announcing that he was "really rich" and estimating his net worth at nearly $9 billion, and offending Hispanics by saying that Mexican immigration means more crime, drugs and rapists in the United States.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In an interview, Mr. Davis confirmed that he had met with Trump advisers – as well as a "super PAC" supporting Senator Ted Cruz of Texas – after his longtime client, Gov. Rick Snyder of Michigan, announced he would not run for president. But Mr. Davis's proposal for a toned-down Mr. Trump never gained traction.

"I never met or talked to Trump, but somebody over there didn't seem to agree," Mr. Davis said. "My guess is that it was the Donald, but I don't know."

At least superficially, Mr. Davis and Mr. Trump might have seemed an intriguing match: Mr. Davis is known for producing quirky and creative ads, which often garner intense attention online and in the political press.

Corey Lewandowski, Mr. Trump's campaign manager, described Mr. Davis as "one of the best in the business," but said the campaign planned to take its own distinctive approach to advertising.

"We've talked to a number of firms, but Mr. Trump, because of his success in business – he has a star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame, he's doing O.K. – he wants to do things a little differently," Mr. Lewandowski said.

In his memo, Mr. Davis proposed an extensive – and presumably costly – media campaign, including immediate advertising in Iowa and New Hampshire, and on national cable.

"I envision something beautiful and elegant, not like any political ad ever, with minimal visuals of Mr. T. Instead it would feature a lot of people across the country talking about finally needing this place to work," Mr. Davis wrote, adding of Mr. Trump, "He is present in the film in an understated way, causing people to think, 'maybe I was wrong about that man.'"

Flashing enthusiasm, Mr. Davis added: "This is a very exciting project. Almost life-defining, if you'll pardon a touch of hubris."

How Donald Trump's man in Iowa plans to mess with the GOP — and win // WaPo // Colby Itkowitz – June 26, 2015

DES MOINES — After years of flamboyant flirtations with presidential politics, Donald Trump is devising a genuine game plan to try to prove that an unfiltered showman can become a vote-getting presidential candidate.

It begins, appropriately for the star of TV's "The Apprentice," with a key hire — a longtime Republican operative who is causing a stir in GOP circles here as Trump's man on the ground and the architect of a strategy designed to upend the traditions of the all-important, first-in-the-nation caucuses.

Chuck Laudner is best known for engineering Rick Santorum's upset caucus win here in 2012 by driving around the former senator from Pennsylvania in his pickup truck. He is now traversing the state, laying the groundwork to convert celebrity gawkers who flock to events featuring Trump, a famed real estate magnate, into first-time caucusgoers.

To Laudner, that means running what he calls a "parallel campaign." While the 15 or so other Republican candidates fight over the 120,000 regular GOP caucusgoers who turn out every four years to spend hours in school gymnasiums or church basements for the grueling voting process, Laudner is seeking out "people who wouldn't be caught dead at a Republican event."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I want to do something different,” he added, “which means everything has to be different.”

Few in the party establishment take Trump seriously as a contender. He is considered more of a sideshow, a carnival attraction in an otherwise strong field of respected senators and governors. Many dismiss Laudner’s efforts as the work of someone enjoying the perks, such as private flights, that come with working for a mogul. John Brabender, a top Santorum adviser, said he couldn’t blame him, pointing to “the novelty of it, of being in Trump land.”

But several new polls that place Trump near the top nationally and in New Hampshire are forcing people to take notice. Although those results could be a sign simply of name recognition, Trump is signaling, through the Laudner hire and other moves, that he intends to wage a serious campaign. He has hired 40 paid campaign staff members around the country, including eight in Iowa.

“Everybody wanted Chuck,” Trump said in an interview this week, boasting of his ability to lure a top-tier consultant.

Trump bristled at the speculation, rampant among rival consultants, that Laudner is being paid far more than the typical rate. Trump and Laudner declined to disclose the salary.

“I pay him the same as everyone else,” Trump said. “It’s very important, very important. I’m a business person. I don’t want to be anybody’s sucker.”

Some Iowa party leaders say Trump has earned a second look merely by bringing a well-respected consultant on board.

Laudner, 49, has been in Iowa politics for 30 years. He ran Rep. Steve King’s first campaign, was King’s chief of staff and led the state party during the 2008 cycle.

“I think about the people who, especially inside-the-Beltway people, they will tend to make offhanded comments that Trump isn’t serious, he’s just playing with it,” said King (R). “All along the way, I said, ‘Trump’s in, I know he’s in.’ The reason I know that is Chuck wouldn’t be there if it was a game.”

Laudner has brought Trump to Iowa nine times this year, including the night he made his official campaign announcement. On Saturday, Trump is returning to headline a sold-out fundraiser for the Madison County GOP at the John Wayne museum. Later, he’ll attend a barbecue for the county party. Co-chair Heather Stancil said the group has sold more tickets for the event than ever before.

Trump and his team first identified Laudner in late 2014. During a January 2015 trip to Iowa to speak at a land investment expo, Trump invited Laudner and his wife on his jet for a chat. Trump asked them questions about caucus rules and ad buys. The couple hung back during the speech. As Laudner recalls, after an informal survey of attendees who said things such as, “That’s exactly what this country needs,” they accepted Trump’s offer.

Laudner said he immediately viewed Trump as a disruptive force for the caucuses. Although typical candidates maneuver to recruit local opinion leaders and activists and fill their living rooms for meet-and-greets, with a few dozen prospective voters at a time, Trump could operate at a higher level, Laudner said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“If I was working for any of these other campaigns, ‘Oh, you gotta be at Pizza Ranch,’ ‘Oh, you gotta meet Suzy because Suzy is the most important person here,’ ” Laudner said, mockingly, during an interview recently at a Tasty Taco here. “And you go to this town, and Jack, if you get Jack, you get the whole town.” But, he added, pointing at the sparse lunchtime crowd, “you wouldn’t get as many people who are in this restaurant right now.”

Trump’s appeal is not based on policy alone, Laudner said. No matter that he has favored abortion rights or once supported a ban on assault weapons, positions that would be deal-breakers for most candidates vying to win the conservative-dominated Iowa caucuses. He can be presented as someone who challenges the Washington political elite with a brazen fearlessness that can come only from having nothing to lose — “the biggest bull to send into the china shop,” Laudner said.

This approach could be a risk in friendly Iowa. Just this week, Trump got into a fight with Spanish-language broadcaster Univision after he said Mexican migrants are “bringing drugs, they’re bringing crime, they’re rapists, and some, I assume, are good people.”

Laudner considers the bombast as a plus, saying, “Once he stops being Donald Trump, people are going to think he’s a politician.”

To underscore the point, Laudner wants to make a scene at the Iowa State Fair in August by walking Trump through the crowd, unannounced, to create “chaos and mayhem.”

On a recent Saturday, wearing a thin-striped gray collared shirt tucked into C.E. Schmidt jeans over scuffed brown cowboy boots, Laudner was deploying one of his well-worn strategies: Be everywhere.

He slipped his TRUMP business card to attendees at a somber veterans suicide awareness event, crashed a campaign appearance by Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.) at a shooting range, and later met local craft brewers at an outdoor beer festival downtown.

He wore an oversize navy blue TRUMP button pinned over his left breast, a walking advertisement and a surveying tool.

At the veterans event, a man in a burgundy Elks jacket tapped the button with his index finger. “I like that pin,” said the man, Roger McQueen, president of the Iowa Elks Club.

McQueen said he doesn’t think Trump has a chance, but added that Trump “makes us think about things differently.”

Later, as Cruz spoke to about 25 people at the shooting range, Laudner asked a tea-party friend to keep his ear to the ground, and suggested that he could arrange a meeting with Trump.

At the brew fest, a man wearing an olive green “Life Is Good” baseball cap spotted Laudner’s button. The man said he was leaning in favor of Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, but he added of Trump: “I like his no bull---- approach.”

Asked in an interview about Laudner’s plan to leverage celebrity into votes, Trump sounded unsure.

“I don’t know. Maybe it won’t translate,” he said. But, he added: “I get the biggest crowds, I get standing ovations.

Trump bump terrifies GOP // Politico // Jonathan Topaz and Daniel Strauss – June 26, 2015

All jokes aside, the Republican Party is officially afraid of Donald Trump.

He has virtually zero chance of winning the presidential nomination. But insiders worry that the loud-mouthed mogul is more than just a minor comedic nuisance on cable news; they fret that he's a loose cannon whose rants about Mexicans and scorched-earth attacks on his rivals will damage the eventual nominee and hurt a party struggling to connect with women and minorities and desperate to win.

"Donald Trump is like watching a road-side accident," said former George W. Bush press secretary Ari Fleischer. "Everybody pulls over to see the mess. And Trump thinks that's entertainment. But running for president is serious. And the risk for the party is he tarnishes everybody."

Those risks were amplified this week after a trio of polls showed him likely to earn a coveted invitation to the party's debates, which ironically were restructured with the very goal of avoiding the circus-like atmosphere of 2012. Having Trump introduce the 2016 field to a national audience was not exactly the Big Tent the party's bigwigs had in mind.

"I'm not excited about somebody as divisive as Trump or somebody as obnoxious as Trump being on the debate stage," one RNC member confessed.

Trump currently sits in eighth place among Republicans, according to the Real Clear Politics average of national polls — ahead of New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry. And this week, he came in second in two New Hampshire polls and in a Fox News national poll, finishing behind only former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush in all three.

Under the rules instituted by Fox News, the top 10 candidates by national polling average will be included in the first debate, to be held in August. Trump's star could easily fade by then. But as of now, he would be in — over 2012 Republican runner-up Rick Santorum, who won 11 states and around 4 million votes last cycle; over Ohio Gov. John Kasich, the popular governor of a key swing state; over South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, a leading foreign policy voice in the field; and over Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, known as a policy wonk.

He'd also make it in over Fiorina, the former Hewlett-Packard CEO who the party establishment desperately wants on the debate stage. Fiorina has earned strong reviews from early-state activists, and party insiders say her inclusion in the debate is critical — both to demonstrate the GOP's diversity and to help male candidates find the right tone in connecting with female voters, whom Republicans have struggled to win over in recent years.

"If Donald Trump elbows out Carly Fiorina, for example, that would be a real tragedy for our side," said Republican strategist Ron Bonjean.

Beyond that, there are concerns about what he'll do once he's on the stage — namely, go hard after the other Republican hopefuls and say incendiary things that will hurt the party.

In recent months, he's said that Fiorina got "fired viciously" from HP and "got clobbered" in her 2010 California Senate loss to Barbara Boxer (she lost by 10 points.) He's rippped Florida Sen. Marco Rubio as "very weak" on immigration. He's called Jeb Bush "an unhappy person" and said he "couldn't negotiate his way out of a paper bag."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Asked whether Trump will keep up the attacks, campaign manager Corey Lewandowski said he would. “They should be worried about Donald Trump,” Lewandowski said of the party establishment, before criticizing Rubio and Bush on several issues.

And worried they are.

“There is a real concern, particularly on the debate stage, that Trump won’t play by the rules and he’s going to throw some below-the-belt punches,” said Republican strategist Ford O’Connell.

“Republicans in a primary don’t like to see the candidates attacking each other,” said Peter Feaman, an RNC National Committeeman from Florida. “They’d like to see the focus stay where it should be, and that’s the leadership of the Democratic Party for the last eight years.”

“The challenge with somebody like him is that when you’re running in these races, there’s sort of an assumption that you’re racing with professionals,” said Katie Packer Gage, a former deputy campaign manager for Mitt Romney. “He makes up facts. It’s a challenge because he’s very unpredictable.”

And above all the RNC — whose self-assessment of the party’s failure in 2012 urged the importance of appealing to non-white voters, especially Hispanics, 71 percent of whom voted for President Barack Obama — is nervous about Trump’s rhetoric. He accused Mexican immigrants of being rapists and smuggling drugs in his announcement speech, and said at a January Republican cattle call in Iowa that half the undocumented immigrants in the U.S. are criminals. In 2011, he led the racially loaded calls for Obama to release his long-form birth certificate and, in April, blamed the president for the riots in Baltimore following the death of Freddie Gray.

Fleischer, one of the five co-authors of the RNC autopsy report, said Trump largely embodied all of the party’s problems with non-white voters. “When he says something irresponsible like getting Mexicans to pay for a wall, he will alienate Hispanics … he’s irresponsible, he’s divisive, he’s hurtful,” he said.

Asked about those concerns, Lewandowski responded: “Who’s saying this, old white guys? You’re saying you’ve got old white guys saying they’re concerned about Donald Trump’s messaging about illegal immigrants coming across our southern border. Wow, that speaks for itself.”

Several Iowa Republicans expressed dismay at Trump’s momentum, labeling him as someone whose brash personality and celebrity status make him a bad fit for the rural first nominating state.

“Most of the rank-and-file Republicans think, ‘What have we done to let a guy like Donald Trump on the debate stage?’” said one Iowa Republican activist with ties to the party. “When I saw the New Hampshire poll, I was like, ‘Oh my god.’”

“He’s just not Iowa nice,” the person added — relaying several stories about Trump’s recent trips to the Hawkeye State. At two events, the person said, Trump insisted on speaking earlier than scheduled so that he could get back to his home in New York City: “It was kind of embarrassing. He left before our donors showed up.” (Lewandowski said he hadn’t seen that at any events in Iowa and touted Trump’s large crowds in the state.)

Party insiders acknowledge that there’s a sliver of voters — those fed up altogether with the political system — who are drawn to Trump. “I love him,” said Jeanne Sangenario, who was on Romney’s New Hampshire women’s leadership team in 2008 and now serves as Seacoast Republican Women director. “Because I know he would take no baloney from anybody from any world leader and he would get things done and the economy would come back big time, he would get it done. No two ways about it.”

Other Republicans say voters will drown him out — particularly in a more formal debate setting where viewers expect a serious discussion.

“I do remember growing up in Kermit [Texas], every time the carnival came to town it always drew a big crowd,” said Republican consultant John Weaver, who worked on Arizona Sen. John McCain’s 2008 presidential campaign and has signed up to work with Kasich. “But nobody wanted the carnival barker to be mayor.”

Donald Trump sent a letter to Univision CEO and president Randy Falco on Friday informing him that "no Univision officer or representative" is allowed to use his Trump National Doral, the resort and golf club immediately adjacent to Univision offices in Miami, the On Media blog has learned.

The move is the latest in a public dispute that started Thursday when Univision announced it would end its business relationship with the Miss Universe Organization, which is co-owned by Trump and NBCUniversal, based on what it described as Trump's "insulting remarks about Mexican immigrants" during the launch of his presidential campaign. Trump later announced that he would sue Univision for breach of contract and defamation, and accused Univision of defaulting on an "iron-clad" $13.5 million contract, which he said it had no right to terminate.

In the letter, Trump writes to Falco, "Please be advised that under no circumstances is any officer or representative of Univision allowed to use Trump National Doral, Miami—its golf courses or any of its facilities. Also, please immediately stop work and close the gate which is being constructed between our respective properties. If this is not done within one week, we will close it."

In a post-script, Trump added: "Please congratulate your Mexican Government officials for having made such outstanding trade deals with the United States. However, inform them that should I become President, those days are over. We are bringing jobs back to the U.S. Also, a meaningful border will be immediately created, not the laughingstock that currently exists."

Shortly after publication of this item, a Univision spokesperson told the On Media blog that the following directive had been sent to all employees: "As part of this decision, [Univision Communications Inc.] employees should not stay at Trump properties while on company business or hold events/activities there."

Trump, who is running for the Republican presidential nomination, said in a speech earlier this month that he would build a wall to stop Mexico from dumping "rapists" and criminals on U.S. soil, though he later issued a statement accusing the media of trying "to distort my comments regarding Mexico and its great people." Univision said Thursday that it would severe its business relations with Trump based on those remarks, including its five-year contract with the Miss Universe Organization, which gives Univision broadcasting rights to the Miss USA and Miss Universe pageants.

In an interview with the On Media blog on Thursday, Trump accused Univision of capitulating to pressure "put on them by various sources in Mexico."

"The Mexican government is putting pressure on Univision to get me to stop exposing the weaknesses the U.S. has at the southern border," he said during the interview, citing his claims that U.S. leaders were "incompetent" on trade with Mexico, allowing the country to take advantage of the U.S., and that the southern border "is a sieve" that "illegals are pouring through."

"The government of Mexico and the lobbyists and the special interests have put tremendous pressure on Univision, a company that is very subservient to Mexico, to get Trump to stop exposing the terrible situation at the border and the terrible trade deals that are being made by the United States to the benefit of Mexico," he said.

"I will not be party to that, because my love of the country is too great to allow this to happen."

On Friday, Trump also published a photograph of a hand-written letter from Univision's Jorge Ramos that included the anchor's personal cell phone number, a move that was likely to inflame tensions between the two parties.

Donald Trump's fight with Univision is heating up. On Friday he published an anchor's personal phone number, called for the resignation of a top executive and banned all of the channel's executives from using Trump's golf course in Miami.

"Under no circumstances is any officer or representative of Univision allowed to use Trump National Doral, Miami," the letter read.

Trump added a P.S.: "Please congratulate your Mexican Government officials for having made such outstanding trade deals with the United States. However, inform them that should I become President, those days are over."

Trump also posted a personal hand-written note that Univision correspondent Jorge Ramos had sent him requesting an interview. The note included Ramos' cell phone number.

Univision fired back on Friday, sending out a memo to its employees that they "should not stay at Trump properties while on company business or hold events/activities there."

The war began after Trump made offensive statements about Mexicans, including calling them "rapists," while announcing he was running for president.

In response, Univision, the largest Spanish language network in the country, broke off its deal to air the Miss USA Pageant, which is partially owned by Trump.

Trump also lashed out at Univision President Alberto Ciurana who apologized to Trump after he posted a photo comparing Trump to the Charleston gunman who killed nine people.

"Apology not accepted," Trump wrote. "I call for his resignation as president of Univision and Univision should not be allowed to host the Presidential debate. It is a total conflict of interest." Univision plans to hold a presidential forum.

In an interview with CNN's Erin Burnett Thursday, Trump called the photo that Ciurana posted "disgraceful."

"When he put that up, he then took it down... he's got tremendous liability," Trump said.

Scott Walker calls for Constitutional amendment to let states define marriage // Politico // Daniel Strauss – June 26, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, seizing the moment after the Supreme Court's landmark ruling legalizing same-sex marriage, called Friday for a Constitutional amendment that would allow the states to decide whether gay marriage should be legal.

Walker's call came shortly after the high court ruled 5-4 that same-sex couples could marry across the country, overturning a number of state same-sex marriage bans.

The ruling was "a grave mistake," the Republican governor said, touting his support for amending his state's constitution "to protect the institution of marriage from exactly this type of judicial activism."

"As a result of this decision, the only alternative left for the American people is to support an amendment to the U.S. Constitution to reaffirm the ability of the states to continue to define marriage," Walker said in the statement.

Walker's statement put him directly at odds with one potential 2016 rival, South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, who said he didn't support pursuing a constitutional amendment.

"[G]iven the quickly changing tide of public opinion on this issue, I do not believe that any attempt to amend the U.S. Constitution could possibly gain the support of three-fourths of the states or a supermajority in the U.S. Congress," Graham said in his statement. "Rather than pursuing a divisive effort that would be doomed to fail, I am committing myself to ensuring the protection of religious liberties of all Americans."

Such an amendment would face steep odds on Capitol Hill.

JINDAL

Bobby Jindal: Supreme Court Decision Is Not the End of the Obamacare Debate // TIME // Bobby Jindal – June 26, 2015

Thursday, the Supreme Court had its say on Obamacare; soon, the American people will have theirs.

As a matter of law, the Court's decision upholding subsidies for states participating in the federally run insurance exchange, healthcare.gov , violates the plain text of Obamacare. The statute expressly restricted insurance subsidies to those individuals purchasing coverage through an "Exchange established by the state." But just as Chief Justice Roberts three years ago decreed that the individual mandate functioned as a tax, even though both Congress and President Barack Obama stated that it wasn't, the Court decided that "Exchange established by the state" meant any type of Exchange, whether established by states or by Washington.

It's a sad outcome for the rule of law — and the English language. But when it comes to the political debate surrounding Obamacare, the Court's ruling ultimately decides little. Of course, Obama, who took an entirely predictable victory lap yesterday, would have you believe otherwise. But we've seen his triumphalism before — and have seen it come crashing back to reality.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Three years ago, Obama stated he wouldn't "refight old battles," mere hours after seven Supreme Court justices — including his own former solicitor general — struck down the law's mandatory Medicaid expansion as unconstitutional "economic dragooning" of the states. On election night 2012, the president promised to "move forward" — months before at least 4.7 million Americans received insurance cancellation notices thanks to Obamacare. And this April, the president arrogantly declared that "the repeal debate is and should be over" — mere weeks before his native state of Hawaii shut its failed insurance exchange, an effort the federal government spent more than $200 million funding.

So, much as the President would like the debate on Obamacare to be over, it isn't. The debate persists in large part because the law has singularly failed in its prime objective: Containing health care costs. Consider why this Supreme Court case mattered so much to the administration in the first place. The law spends over $1.7 trillion on subsidized coverage to make insurance more "affordable," largely to offset the new mandates and regulations that have raised the price of insurance.

And with myriad insurers proposing double-digit premium increases for next year — some as high as 50% — candidate Obama's 2008 promise to lower insurance premiums by $2,500 per family is further away then ever. No wonder the law remains singularly unpopular. When it comes to winning the debate on Obamacare, there is still all to play for.

But in order to win, we conservatives first have to play. That means outlining our alternative vision for health care: How we would restore freedom and choice to a health care sector currently lacking for both — and most importantly, how we would slow, and hopefully reverse, the trend of skyrocketing health care costs.

As I write this, I stand as the sole major declared presidential candidate (with the possible exception of Bernie Sanders) to put forward my vision on health care, and an alternative to Obamacare. As proud as I am of my plan, that is a boast I wish I were not able to make. Because Republicans, from the top down, must outline a clear and coherent vision for health care to win the trust of the American people to repeal this President's health law.

While we should be shouting our vision from the rooftops, many of my fellow candidates have managed barely a whisper about how exactly they would repeal Obamacare, or what they would do to tackle the main issue plaguing our health care system: rising costs. Sen. Mike Lee recently stated that lack of an Obamacare replacement plan should be a disqualifier for any conservative presidential candidate. He's absolutely right. We owe it to the American people to release our plans well before November 2016, and to have a robust debate within our party about what should come after Obamacare.

Because, contrary to this President's self-proclaimed edicts, yesterday's Supreme Court decision is not the end of the debate on Obamacare.

Now that the Supreme Court has ruled, the debate shifts back to the elected branches of government — the ones that caused our health care mess in the first place. It is there that conservatives can complete our work to repeal Obamacare.

Jindal: Obama & 'apprentice-in-chief' Hillary Clinton taking U.S. down 'wrong path' // Radio Iowa // O. Kay Henderson – June 26, 2015

Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal is in Iowa today, his first trip here since officially entering the Republican presidential race this week.

"I think as conservatives we need to stand up for our principles," Jindal told Radio Iowa this morning. "Let's do something new. Let's endorse our own beliefs. You know, for too long conservatives have tried to hide our beliefs, try to make the left and the media like us and it doesn't work."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jindal said President Obama and Hillary Clinton have led the country down the wrong path economically, internationally and culturally.

"This president has done more damage in my lifetime than I've seen from any other president in our country," Jindal said. "I worry that his apprentice-in-chief, Hillary Clinton, his apprentice-in-waiting, would continue down this wrong path."

Jindal accuses the Obama Administration of being more interested in waging war on trans fat than on "naming" and defeating radical Islamic terrorists. And Jindal said, domestically, the Affordable Care Act is a bad law that needs to be repealed and replaced with market-based alternatives.

KASICH

Kasich urged to use vetoes in budget // Toledo Blade // Jim Provance – June 27, 2015

COLUMBUS — A $71.2 billion, two-year budget is heading for Gov. John Kasich's desk as the calls rolled in for him to exercise his line-item veto pen.

"There are going to be some vetoes, and there will probably be some disagreements on vetoes," he said Friday. He offered no clues as to what they might be.

The House voted 61-34 to send the spending plan to the governor, with a single Democrat joining Republicans in support and three Republicans breaking with the majority to oppose it.

Among other things, the governor has been urged to strike language imposing more restrictions on abortion clinics, penalizing Toledo and other cities that won court orders to continue operating traffic cameras, restricting the collective bargaining power of some workers, and eliminating journalists' ability to review gun concealed carry permit records.

The governor will sign the budget Tuesday.

The plan contains an estimated $1.97 billion in income tax breaks for businesses and individuals over two years, pumps $955 million more into basic K-12 school aid, and orders a freeze in college and university tuition over the next two years.

The plan banks hundreds of millions in surpluses, bringing reserves to nearly $2 billion. Perhaps days from announcing a GOP bid for the White House, he contrasted that with the federal fiscal picture.

"Normally in good times, it's party time," he said. "Everybody wants to spend. The [Ohio legislative] leaders feel the pressure over this. I've been part of this process. I left Washington with a $5 billion surplus. The next thing I knew we were $18 trillion in the hole down there with more debt and more spending."

State Reps. Teresa Fedor and Michael Ashford of Toledo and Mike Sheehy of Oregon, all Democrats, opposed the budget.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We could have balanced more of our budget to have more opportunity for the middle class," Ms. Fedor said. "More charter school reform hasn't happened yet. The issues for Toledo need to be addressed. The traffic camera issue should lay low until we find out from the courts what is happening, and there was definitely an attack on women and their right to control their reproductive systems and health care."

The budget won support from all northwest Ohio Republicans — Reps. Barbara Sears (Monclova Township), Tim Brown (Bowling Green), Robert Sprague (Findlay), Steven Kraus (Sandusky), Robert McColley (Napoleon), Bill Reineke (Tiffin), Bob Cupp (Lima), Tony Burkley (Payne), and Jeff McClain (Upper Sandusky).

With the exception of increasing the cigarette tax by 35 cents to $1.60 a pack, lawmakers did not embrace Mr. Kasich's proposals to move further from income taxes toward consumption taxes. The governor had proposed higher taxes on sales, oil and natural gas drilling, other tobacco products, and larger businesses.

Mr. McColley said transitioning to a consumption tax-based economy is probably a good idea over the long run.

"But we need to do that slowly and deliberately," he said. "It is something we need to do with a great deal of planning, which is one reason I'm happy to see the 2020 tax (study) council being introduced in the budget and being implemented in the near future."

The budget would reduce income taxes by 6.3 percent across all brackets. It also offers a 75 percent cut on the first $250,000 earned by small businesses, a 100 percent cut next year, and a flat 3 percent tax on income above $250,000.

"We feel this budget is tired…," Rep. Denise Driehaus (D., Cincinnati) said. "I think this budget was offered back in 2005. It's got the same tax policy. It's as if we didn't learn anything from that… I know we expect a different result."

The budget promises no school district will receive less state funding than it did this year and offers about $200 million more to colleges and universities in exchange for a two-year freeze on tuition and efforts to reduce costs.

Republican House members pointed to efforts to control Medicaid costs, but did not mention that the budget quietly continues to fund the controversial Medicaid expansion Mr. Kasich has championed.

Pro-choice advocates are urging the governor to strike language from the plan that threatens to close the Capital Care Clinic, Toledo's last abortion clinic. Capital Care recently won the first round in its legal fight against the state's attempt to close it because its emergency-care agreement is with the University of Michigan Health System in Ann Arbor, more than 50 miles away.

The budget bill would require such an agreement to be with a hospital within 30 miles of the clinic.

Move On or Keep Fighting? GOP Candidates React to Gay-Marriage Ruling // WSJ – June 26, 2015

The Supreme Court decision guaranteeing marriage equality to gay couples drew criticism on Friday from

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans running for president in 2016, but the contenders took different tones and promised different degrees of pushback–signaling just what a tricky political issue this is for the party.

Some candidates expressed disappointment but signaled it was time to move on, while others blasted the court and vowed to keep fighting.

Former Sen. Rick Santorum said: “Today, five unelected justices decided to redefine the foundational unit that binds together our society without public debate or input … The stakes are too high and the issue too important to simply cede the will of the people to five unaccountable justices.”

Ben Carson, a retired neurosurgeon, struck a significantly less confrontational note:

“While I strongly disagree with the Supreme Court’s decision, their ruling is now the law of the land. I call on Congress to make sure deeply held religious views are respected and protected. The government must never force Christians to violate their religious beliefs. I support same-sex civil unions but to me, and millions like me, marriage is a religious service not a government form.”

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush restated his support for traditional marriage but struck a more conciliatory tone about accepting gays.

“Guided by my faith, I believe in traditional marriage. I believe the Supreme Court should have allowed the states to make this decision,” he wrote. “I also believe that we should love our neighbor and respect others, including those making lifetime commitments. In a country as diverse as ours, good people who have opposing views should be able to live side by side. It is now crucial that as a country we protect religious freedom and the right of conscience and also not discriminate.”

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio said the right to redefine marriage should rest with the states but that he accepts the court’s ruling as the law.

“As we look ahead, it must be a priority of the next president to nominate judges and justices committed to applying the Constitution as written and originally understood,” he said in a statement. The next president must also “strive to protect the First Amendment rights of religious institutions and millions of Americans whose faith holds a traditional view of marriage.”

Carly Fiorina, former chief executive of Hewlett-Packard Co., called the court’s decision “only the latest example of an activist court ignoring its constitutional duty to say what the law is and not what the law should be.” Ms. Fiorina said in the statement that the ability to “redefine marriage” should have stayed among the states.

Echoing the concerns of others in the GOP field, she also expressed concern about “protecting the religious liberties and freedom of conscience for those Americans that profoundly disagree with today’s decision.”

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee blasted the court’s decision upholding gay marriage: “The Supreme Court has spoken with a very divided voice on something only the Supreme Being can do — redefine marriage,” said Mr. Huckabee, a candidate who is a favorite among evangelical conservatives. “I will not acquiesce to an imperial court any more than our Founders acquiesced to an imperial British monarch. We must resist and reject judicial tyranny, not retreat.”

Donald Trump tweeted his reaction to the ruling, taking a jab at Mr. Bush in the process. “Once again the Bush appointed Supreme Court Justice John Roberts has let us down. Jeb pushed him hard! Remember!"

Chief Justice Roberts was one of the four dissenting justices in Obergefell v. Hodges, which struck down restrictions on same-sex marriage in Kentucky, Michigan, Ohio and Tennessee that a Cincinnati-based federal appeals court upheld last year and validated a series of lower court opinions that expanded the institution across most of the nation since 2012.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, a GOP presidential candidate who is trying to appeal to evangelical voters, accused the court of bowing to public opinion and threatening the religious freedom of people who are committed to traditional marriage.

"The government should not force those who have sincerely held religious beliefs about marriage to participate in these ceremonies. That would be a clear violation of America's long held commitment to religious liberty as protected in the First Amendment."

Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry joined those who said they were disappointed, and responded to promising to appoint more conservative justices to the bench if he was president.

"I fundamentally disagree with the court rewriting the law and assaulting the 10th Amendment. Our founding fathers did not intend for the judicial branch to legislate from the bench, and as president, I would appoint strict Constitutional conservatives who will apply the law as written."

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who is expected to announce his candidacy for the GOP nomination, is the only member of the 2016 field to call for a constitutional amendment to reverse the Supreme Court's ruling. In a statement, he called the ruling a "grave mistake" and said that the power to redefine marriage should rest with the states.

"I call on the president and all governors to join me in reassuring millions of Americans that the government will not force them to participate in activities that violate their deeply held religious beliefs," he said.

Mr. Walker's call for a constitutional amendment illustrates he has shifted his views to more aggressively back gay-marriage bans since the court in 2014 declined to consider requests from Wisconsin and four other states to reinstate such bans. Mr. Walker had backed his state's ban on gay marriage but said his fight was "over in Wisconsin" after the court's decision, according to the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel.

Earlier this month, he told ABC News that if the court ruled in favor of gay marriage, a constitutional amendment was "the only next approach."

Robert Nichols, a spokesman for another potential candidate, Ohio Republican Gov. John Kasich, said Mr. Kasich would respect the court's ruling. "The governor has always believed in the sanctity of marriage between a man and a woman, but our nation's highest court has spoken and we must respect its decision."

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who is is expected to announce he's running for president next Tuesday, said that he didn't agree with the majority's opinion and sided with Chief Justice Roberts in arguing that voters, not the courts, should have decided on the issue.

Still, Mr. Christie, who believes marriage should be reserved to heterosexual couples, said that the U.S. should now abide by the law. Mr. Christie dropped his opposition to gay marriage in New Jersey after the state's Supreme Court ruled in favor of it in 2013.

“Our job is going to be to support the law of the land and that’s the law of the land,” Mr. Christie said while taking questions after signing the New Jersey budget on Friday.

Reaction from the Democratic candidates was celebratory:

Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton was the first White House contender to tweet her reaction to the ruling:

Mrs. Clinton, who came out in support of gay marriage in 2013, also issued a statement praising the Supreme Court ruling:

“This ruling is an affirmation of the commitment of couples across the country who love one another,” Mrs. Clinton said. “It reflects the will of the vast and growing multitude of Americans who believe that LGBT couples deserve to be recognized under the law and treated equally in the eyes of society. And it represents our country at its best: inclusive, open, and striving towards true equality.”

She added that the next goal must be a broader effort to end discrimination. “While we celebrate today, our work won’t be finished until every American can not only marry, but live, work, pray, learn and raise a family free from discrimination and prejudice,” she said. “We cannot settle for anything less.”

Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont also hailed the court’s decision. “Today the Supreme Court fulfilled the words engraved upon its building: ‘Equal justice under law.’

“This decision is a victory for same-sex couples across our country as well as all those seeking to live in a nation where every citizen is afforded equal rights. For far too long our justice system has marginalized the gay community and I am very glad the Court has finally caught up to the American people.”

Martin O’Malley recalled passing gay marriage in Maryland as governor and tweeted, “There’s no greater human right than love.”

Affordable Care Act alternative now key for GOP hopefuls // Boston Herald // Lindsay Kalter – June 26, 2015

The Supreme Court decision upholding Obamacare will give GOP presidential candidates a new angle to woo voters, but they’ll have to hone their rhetoric and swap out the old “repeal” mantra for well-defined plans to improve it, political operatives say.

“It’s a huge opportunity for Republicans if they handle it right,” said Fergus Cullen, a former chairman of New Hampshire Republican Party. “It’s not enough for Republican candidates to say, ‘We need to repeal every word of Obamacare.’ The Republican position on health care cannot be, ‘Do not get sick, do not get hurt, do not get old.’ They have to come up with an alternative.”

The 6-to-3 ruling backs the Obama administration, agreeing that all low- and moderate-income residents should have access to subsidies, regardless of whether they live in states with their own health insurance exchanges, as the law’s wording required, or used the federal exchange instead.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Congress passed the Affordable Care Act to improve health insurance markets, not to destroy them," Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. wrote.

The ruling ups the pressure for Republicans to breathe new life into Obamacare pushback in early-voting states such as New Hampshire, where they'll need to entice anti-ACA voters with plans that include age-based refundable tax credits and scrapping the employer mandate, said Sally Pipes, head of California-based think tank Pacific Research Institute.

"The Republican candidates will really have to articulate what their vision of health care will be," Pipes said. "I think people in a state like New Hampshire would appreciate what's good for job growth, which includes getting rid of employer mandate."

GOP national pundit Ford O'Connell said Republican candidates "will need to provide more than just red meat," and should focus on three primary changes to the system: allowing consumers to buy insurance across state lines, de-linking it from employment and strengthening patient power over their insurance accounts.

"Voters will want insurance that can travel with you, not the car you're driving," O'Connell said.

Although cries for a repeal will likely still sound from the Republican voting pool, the administration's victory may pave the way for Congress to make tweaks and improvements to the law rather than fully replace it, said Wendy Parmet, director of the Northeastern Program on Health Policy and Law.

"One of the things that has happened over the last several years has been that Republicans have tried to wage existential challenges to the Affordable Care Act," Pamet said. "It's going to be clear that it isn't going away. It's becoming part of the fabric of society."

She added, "Maybe we can get to politicians cleaning up a little and making it work better."

The Subtle, But Hugely Significant Shift In The Republican Response To The Marriage Ruling // Buzzfeed // Rosie Gray – June 26, 2015

Two of the leading Republican contenders responded nearly in lockstep on Friday to the Supreme Court ruling that has legalized same-sex marriage nationwide: by waving a white flag in the fight over marriage — and promising to take up arms in a new culture war battle over religious freedom.

"While I disagree with this decision, we live in a republic and must abide by the law," Marco Rubio said in a statement, then called for officials to "protect the First Amendment rights of religious institutions and millions of Americans whose faiths hold a traditional view of marriage."

"It is my hope that each side will respect the dignity of the other," Rubio said.

Jeb Bush cited his Catholic faith to explain his personal belief in "traditional marriage," but added, "I also believe we should love our neighbor and respect others, including those making lifetime commitments." He then pivoted to the need to "protect religious freedom and the right of conscience and also not discriminate."

No one said they agreed with the court, but a number of the candidates signaled the desire to cut their political losses on the losing issue of marriage — and instead reframe their party's social agenda in terms of protecting the viewpoints of the dissenting. The distinction may seem like mere semantics, but it represents a profound shift in the culture wars, in which Republicans are deliberately moving from offense to defense.

For decades, Republicans rallied the religious right by championing "family values," and pressing for policies meant to infuse American society with Judeo-Christian morals — from anti-sodomy laws to crackdowns on pornography and keeping condoms out of schools. Social conservatives presented themselves as the country's "moral majority" — the banner under which Jerry Falwell mobilized millions of Christian voters in the '70s and '80s — and their mission was to defeat the disproportionately powerful secular elites in media and government.

The populist disavowal of Washington elite has remained, but as the GOP's agenda on gay issues has fallen out of favor in recent years, party leaders are no longer claiming to be in the majority. Instead, they are making appeals to pluralism — which are much more popular — arguing that while society has changed where LGBT issues are concerned, religious conservatives should be able to object when they believe their principles have been infringed.

Not all of the 2016 candidates on Friday followed the example of Bush, Rubio, and also dark-horse candidate Lindsey Graham, who said in a statement that he opposes a marriage amendment to the Constitution: "Rather than pursuing a divisive effort that would be doomed to fail, I am committing myself to ensuring the protection of religious liberties of all Americans." Conservative culture warriors like Rick Santorum, Mike Huckabee, and Bobby Jindal all quickly released statements harshly condemning the court, signaling that they still have an appetite to fight the marriage movement on the merits.

And, more importantly, Scott Walker — considered a top-tier candidate — took a sharper tone on Friday's ruling. Walker argued in favor of a marriage amendment to the Constitution and called the court's decision a "grave mistake." Walker is expected to make a serious bid to win the Iowa caucuses next year; his response seems aimed at the conservative Iowa voters who can help him do that.

But those candidates signaling surrender in the marriage fight are no doubt hoping that an emphasis on religious freedom will be enough to placate the still-influential conservative Christian primary voters in states like Iowa and South Carolina. It remains to be seen whether those voters are ready to embrace the same political pragmatism that their prospective standard-bearers are exhibiting.

WASHINGTON — Friday's U.S. Supreme Court decision legalizing same-sex marriage across the country gave Democrats running for president a rallying cry, while Republicans disagreed with resignation, vitriol or somewhere in between.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush was conciliatory, saying:

"In a country as diverse as ours, good people who have opposing views should be able to live side by side. It is now crucial that as a country we protect religious freedom and the right of conscience and also not discriminate."

U.S. Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., sounded ready to move on from this legal fight:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“While I disagree with this decision, we live in a republic and must abide by the law. As we look ahead, it must be a priority of the next president to nominate judges and justices committed to applying the Constitution as written and originally understood.”

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, meanwhile, sounded like he was preparing for armed insurrection:

“I will not acquiesce to an imperial court any more than our Founders acquiesced to an imperial British monarch. We must resist and reject judicial tyranny, not retreat.”

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker was not going that far, as he vowed to appoint conservative justices if elected and spoke of the religious liberty fight to come:

“I call on the president and all governors to join me in reassuring millions of Americans that the government will not force them to participate in activities that violate their deeply held religious beliefs. No one wants to live in a country where the government coerces people to act in opposition to their conscience. We will continue to fight for the freedoms of all Americans.”

Democrats were in a celebratory mood. Former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley even went down to the Supreme Court to join in.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender community’s battles go beyond marriage:

“For too many LGBT Americans who are subjected to discriminatory laws, true equality is still just out of reach. While we celebrate today, our work won’t be finished until every American can not only marry, but live, work, pray, learn and raise a family free from discrimination and prejudice. We cannot settle for anything less.”

Clinton in recent days has used the issue to fire up supporters. When her campaign sent out an email asking backers to “tell us why you’re a part of this campaign,” Kevin Lowery, of Milton, wrote back.

Lowery told the Clinton camp he is glad Clinton supports protections for gay couples, considering that he had married his husband in New York City a couple years ago, but the union still was not recognized in Georgia.

Clinton replied Thursday with a blast email to all of her supporters quoting from Lowery’s letter and adding: “Any day now, the Supreme Court will decide whether or not to recognize marriages across the country. Like millions of people, I’m waiting and hoping. And I’m thinking of families like Kevin’s.”

In a phone interview, Lowery said he was surprised by Clinton’s reply.

“I feel like people like her operate in an entirely different world than I do,” Lowery said. “To be brought into such close connection, it’s probably one of the coolest things I’ve ever felt, one of the closest things I’ve felt to ever meeting a celebrity.”

Then came Friday’s even bigger news.

"I feel like I'm on Cloud Nine," Lowery said.

Opposition to same-sex marriage: political advantage or 'political suicide'? // Radio Iowa // O. Kay Henderson – June 26, 2015

Today's U.S. Supreme Court ruling which has legalized same-sex marriage in all 50 states is drawing both cheers and jeers. Republican presidential candidate Bobby Jindal, campaigning in Iowa today, said the ruling tramples on states' rights.

"I'm a proponent of traditional marriage between a man and a woman," Jindal told Radio Iowa this morning. "I don't think the court should be overturning what states have decided on this. In Louisiana, it's in our state constitution."

Jindal said this ruling will "pave the way for an all-out assault on religious liberty."

"What is happening today is you see that Christian business owners, florists, caterers and musicians — they're being forced to participate in wedding ceremonies that violate their beliefs, their conscience," Jindal said. "I think that's wrong."

Republican candidate Rick Santorum, campaigning in western Iowa this morning, called the ruling a "bad decision" that will "harm the country." Santorum favors an amendment to the U.S. Constitution that would ban same-sex marriage.

During a campaign stop in Pella Thursday, Republican presidential candidate Mike Huckabee said he doesn't accept the "idea" of same-sex marriage.

"I don't believe it is a Biblical norm. I have friends who are homosexual. I love them. They're my friends. I don't quit loving them because of what they do or who they are," Huckabee said. "I don't accept the idea of a same-sex marriage not because I don't like people, but because I believe the institution of marriage is something very sacred, unique, that is not just a human institution. It's a divine institution that reflects the very relationship of Christ and his church. For me, that's something I can't yield."

Huckabee, Santorum and Jindal are among the nine GOP candidates who will speak in mid-July at the Family Leadership Summit in Ames. The event's hosted by Bob Vander Plaats of The Family Leader and Vander Plaats told Radio Iowa this morning this ruling will bring "common sense" Americans who oppose same-sex marriage "out of the woodwork."

"We're going to start seeing what the candidates are saying," Vander Plaats predicted.

Democratic presidential candidates Hillary Clinton, Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley are praising the court's decision on same-sex marriage. State Senator Matt McCoy, a Democrat from Des Moines who is the only openly gay member of the legislature, said it's not a big issue for Democrats and he predicts it won't be for Republicans either.

"I think this is an issue that's going to get a lot of oxygen for the next several months, then it is absolutely going to become one of the least important issues of the campaign," McCoy told Radio Iowa.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

However, McCoy said Democrats do need to realize this decision may not have gone the way it did if a Republican president had been in office since 2009.

"I think we need to remind Democratic voters just why we have the decision we have today," McCoy said. "And that's primary due to the good appointments that we've had on the court."

Jennifer Harvey of West Des Moines and her partner legally married in 2009, shortly after Iowa's Supreme Court ruled the state's ban on same-sex marriage was unconstitutional. Harvey suggests opposition to same-sex marriage is a perilous position for a politician.

"I think for politicians who decide to take a stand on that, it might not be right now, but in the very near future that'll be a form of political suicide," Harvey said. "If you watch how political sentiment has changed, people very quickly come ot realize that It just sort of makes sense. I think this is settled. I think this will be a non-starter in the next three, four or five years."

Harvey was a bit surprised by her emotional reaction to today's decision.

"Kind of just a big sign of relief, like we can finally stop talking about this," Harvey said, laughing. "It feels like it's been small victory, small victory, small victory and I was surprised to find myself feel this ping of real joy and kind of a, 'Wow! It's finally done.'"

Harvey and her partner, Chris, are the parents of two children and she says in the past six years that same-sex marriage has been legal in Iowa, there's been a "climate change" in how her family is treated and perceived by others.

President Obama Eulogizes Charleston Pastor as One Who Understood Grace // NYT // Kevin Sack and Gardiner Harris – June 26, 2015

CHARLESTON, S.C. — In one of his presidency's most impassioned reflections on race, President Obama eulogized the Rev. Clementa C. Pinckney on Friday by calling on the nation to emulate the grace that he displayed in his work and that the people of South Carolina demonstrated after the massacre of nine worshipers at Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church.

Before nearly 6,000 mourners and a worldwide television audience, Mr. Obama, who met Mr. Pinckney during his first presidential campaign, placed the shootings in the context of America's long history of violence against African-Americans. He also reiterated his plea to restrict the availability of firearms and called for the removal of the Confederate battle flag from the grounds of the State House in Columbia.

Mr. Obama thrilled the mostly African-American audience by preaching with revivalist cadences, and by closing his 40-minute address by singing, in solo, the opening refrain of "Amazing Grace." The crowd came to its feet and joined in, leading the Rev. Norvel Goff, a presiding elder in the A.M.E. church, to later "thank the Reverend President."

“Maybe we now realize the way racial bias can infect us even when we don’t realize it,” Mr. Obama said as Mr. Pinckney’s coffin, draped in a blanket of red roses, sat before him. “So that we’re guarding against not just racial slurs, but we’re also guarding against the subtle impulse to call Johnny back for a job interview, but not Jamal. So that we search our hearts when we consider laws to make it harder for some of our fellow citizens to vote.” By treating every child as important regardless of skin color and by opening up opportunities for all Americans, Mr. Obama said, “We express God’s grace.”

As the nation’s first African-American president, Mr. Obama has often struggled to find the proper balance of timing, words and place to speak about America’s racial divisions. Intent on being seen as a president for all and confronted with what he saw as the more urgent economic crisis, he approached racially charged disputes cautiously in his first term.

But politically unfettered after his re-election in 2012, and angered by the racially motivated killings in Charleston and the deaths of black men at the hands of white police officers, the president on Friday dispensed with his usual reticence, rediscovered the soaring rhetoric that inspired his supporters in 2008, and spoke with unusual — and occasionally acerbic — directness. “For too long,” Mr. Obama said, “we’ve been blind to the way past injustices continue to shape the present. Perhaps we see that now. Perhaps this tragedy causes us to ask some tough questions about how we can permit so many of our children to languish in poverty, or attend dilapidated schools, or grow up without prospects for a job or for a career.”

As he spoke, Mr. Obama was backed by a stage filled with African Methodist Episcopal preachers, cloaked in the purple vestments of their church, and a black-robed gospel choir.

Mr. Obama joined with others paying tribute in stressing that the 21-year-old white man charged in the killings had failed to achieve his stated goal of inciting racial conflagration. Rather, he said, the killings had the opposite effect, generating an unprecedented show of racial unity and inspiring a nationwide revolt against Confederate symbols.

“It was an act that drew on a long history of bombs and arson and shots fired at churches,” Mr. Obama said, “not random, but as a means of control, a way to terrorize and oppress, an act that he imagined would incite fear and recrimination, violence and suspicion, an act that he presumed would deepen divisions that trace back to our nation’s original sin.”

He paused for effect. “Oh, but God works in mysterious ways,” Mr. Obama said. “God has different ideas. He didn’t know he was being used by God.” The crowd erupted in applause as women waved their hands toward the ceiling.

Mr. Obama commended South Carolina’s Republican governor, Nikki R. Haley, for her call this week to bring down the Confederate flag in Columbia, saying it would be “a meaningful balm for so many unhealed wounds.”

“Removing the flag from this state’s Capitol would not be an act of political correctness,” Mr. Obama said. “It would not be an insult to the valor of Confederate soldiers. It would simply be an acknowledgment that the cause for which they fought — the cause of slavery — was wrong. The imposition of Jim Crow after the Civil War, the resistance to civil rights for all people, was wrong.”

The service lasted more than four hours as speaker after speaker, first legislators, then church leaders, then cousins and friends, and finally the president, took the podium to pay homage to Mr. Pinckney, who was both a respected state senator and a pastor in the most prestigious A.M.E. pulpit in South Carolina.

TD Arena in Charleston, just steps from the historic whitewashed church where the killings took place on June 17 during a Wednesday night Bible study, was packed with pastors in their black robes and collars, women in flowered hats and parents eager to expose their children to a moment of history. An estimated 5,000 people were turned away because of a lack of space. Members of Emanuel, where Mr. Pinckney had been pastor for five years, were given prime seating on the arena floor.

The dignitaries in attendance included the first lady, Michelle Obama; Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr. and his wife, Dr. Jill Biden; House Speaker John A. Boehner, who traveled on Air Force One for the first time during the Obama presidency; Ms. Haley; Hillary Rodham Clinton, the former secretary of state and current Democratic presidential candidate; Senator Tim Scott of South Carolina; Mayor Joseph P. Riley Jr. of Charleston; dozens of members of Congress and the South Carolina Legislature; and civil rights leaders like the Rev. Jesse L. Jackson, the Rev. Al Sharpton, and Martin Luther King III.

“Sister Jennifer and the girls,” Mr. Goff said, addressing Mr. Pinckney’s wife and two daughters, “I want you to know that the world has come to you.”

After the service, the Obamas and the Bidens met with the families of those killed as well as the survivors of the massacre.

Mr. Obama, who acknowledged that he did not know Mr. Pinckney well, said that friends of the pastor’s had remarked “that when Clementa Pinckney entered a room, it was like the future arrived; that even from a young age, folks knew he was special, anointed.”

While the service centered on paeans to Mr. Pinckney, some speakers took the opportunity to address the nature of his death and its remarkable political aftermath. “Someone should have told the young man,” said the Right Rev. John Richard Bryant, senior bishop of the A.M.E. church, referring to the suspect in the killings, Dylann Roof. “He wanted to start a race war but he came to the wrong place.” The audience rose in a thunderous ovation, punctuated by an organist’s wailing exclamations.

A sign on an easel to the left of the stage declared: “Wrong church! Wrong people! Wrong day!”

State Senator Gerald Malloy, one of Mr. Pinckney’s closest friends, spoke of Mr. Pinckney’s support for often unsuccessful legislative efforts to expand Medicaid coverage, regulate discriminatory lending practices and block voter identification requirements. “He answered life’s most pervasive question, and that is what are you doing for others,” Mr. Malloy said.

The pastor’s funeral was the third in a series of nine that is scheduled to conclude on Tuesday. Three others are planned for Saturday, one each on Sunday, Monday and Tuesday.

Mr. Pinckney’s burial in Marion, S.C., home to his mother’s family, concluded a three-day tour that took his coffin first to Columbia, where he lay in state beneath the State House rotunda, then to his simple childhood church in Ridgeland, S.C., and, on Thursday night, to Emanuel itself. Thousands of dark-suited mourners waited in line for hours to walk through the church, peer into Mr. Pinckney’s open coffin and pay respects to his devastated family.

Ushers handed out a glossy program filled with photographs of Mr. Pinckney, from childhood through his pastorate. In one, he was dressed in blue hospital scrubs holding one of his newborn daughters. Others showed him as a boy, dressed in his uniform of a vested suit and necktie.

The program included letters to Mr. Pinckney from his family, their first public comments since the shootings.

“You promised me you would never leave me!” Jennifer Benjamin Pinckney wrote to her husband. “You promised me we would be together for years to come! You promised me we would watch our children grow, get married and have children of their own. You promised me that we would grow old together and spend our latter years without the demands of the Church or the State. I feel robbed, cheated, and cut short."

Mr. Pinckney's eldest daughter, Eliana, 11, observed that "when someone loves you, they care even if they are not there." Her sister, Malana, 6, wrote: "Dear Daddy: I know you were shot at the Church and you went to Heaven. I love you so much! I know you love me and I know that you know that I love you too." She signed it, "Your baby girl and grasshopper."

Supreme Court rules gay couples nationwide have a right to marry // WaPo // Robert Barnes – June 26, 2015

A deeply divided Supreme Court on Friday delivered a historic victory for gay rights, ruling 5 to 4 that the Constitution requires that same-sex couples be allowed to marry no matter where they live.

The court's action rewarded years of legal work by same-sex marriage advocates and marked the culmination of an unprecedented upheaval in public opinion and the nation's jurisprudence.

Marriages began Friday in states that had previously thwarted the efforts of same-sex couples to wed, while some states continued to resist what they said was a judicial order that changed the traditional definition of marriage and sent the country into uncharted territory. As of the court's decision Friday morning, there were 14 states where same-sex couples were not allowed to marry.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who has written all of the court's decisions recognizing and expanding gay rights, said the decision was based on the fundamental right to marry and the equality that must be afforded gay Americans.

"Under the Constitution, same-sex couples seek in marriage the same legal treatment as opposite-sex couples, and it would disparage their choices and diminish their personhood to deny them this right," Kennedy wrote. He was joined in the ruling by the court's liberal justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Stephen G. Breyer, Sonia Sotomayor and Elena Kagan.

All four of the court's most conservative members — Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr. — dissented, and each wrote a separate opinion.

The common theme in their dissents was that judicial activism on the part of five members of the court had usurped a power that belongs to the people.

"If you are among the many Americans — of whatever sexual orientation — who favor expanding same-sex marriage, by all means celebrate today's decision," wrote Roberts, who for the first time in his tenure marked his disagreement with a decision by reading part of his dissent from the bench.

"Celebrate the achievement of a desired goal. Celebrate the opportunity for a new expression of commitment to a partner. Celebrate the availability of new benefits. But do not celebrate the Constitution. It had nothing to do with it," he wrote.

Scalia called the decision a "threat to American democracy," saying it robs citizens of "the freedom to govern themselves."

In a statement in the White House Rose Garden, President Obama hailed the decision: “This ruling is a victory for America. This decision affirms what millions of Americans already believe in their hearts. When all Americans are truly treated as equal, we are more free.”

It wasn’t until 2012 that Obama declared that same-sex couples should be able to marry, and it was only last year that he said he thought the Constitution provided such a right. But by Friday evening, the rainbow colors that gay rights activists have adopted were projected onto the north face of the White House. With the Supreme Court’s ruling, Obama said, “Today we can say in no uncertain terms that we have made our union a little more perfect.”

There were wild scenes of celebrations on the sidewalk outside the Supreme Court. Same-sex marriage supporters had arrived early, armed with signs and rainbow flags. They cheered at the announcement of a constitutional right for gay marriage, which did not legally exist anywhere in the world until the turn of this century. The first legally recognized same-sex marriages in the United States took place just 11 years ago, the result of a Massachusetts state supreme court decision.

Jim Obergefell, who became the face of the case, Obergefell v. Hodges, when he sought to put his name on his husband’s Ohio death certificate as the surviving spouse, said, “Today’s ruling from the Supreme Court affirms what millions across the country already know to be true in our hearts: that our love is equal.”

“It is my hope that the term gay marriage will soon be a thing of the past, that from this day forward it will be, simply, marriage,” he said.

But Austin R. Nimocks, senior counsel for the Alliance Defending Freedom, a group that supports traditional marriage, said: “Today, five lawyers took away the voices of more than 300 million Americans to continue to debate the most important social institution in the history of the world. . . . Nobody has the right to say that a mom or a woman or a dad or a man is irrelevant. There are differences that should be celebrated.”

The Supreme Court used cases from Michigan, Ohio, Kentucky and Tennessee, where restrictions against same-sex marriage were upheld by an appeals court last year, to find that the Constitution does not allow such prohibitions.

Kennedy over the past 20 years has written the Supreme Court’s most important gay rights cases: overturning criminal laws on homosexual conduct, protecting gays from discrimination and declaring that the federal government could not refuse to recognize same-sex marriages performed where they were legal.

He often employs a lofty, writing-for-history tone, and Friday’s decision was no different.

Referring to the couples who brought the cases before the court, Kennedy wrote: “It would misunderstand these men and women to say they disrespect the idea of marriage. Their plea is that they do respect it, respect it so deeply that they seek to find its fulfillment for themselves. Their hope is not to be condemned to live in loneliness, excluded from one of civilization’s oldest institutions.”

Kennedy did not respond directly to the court’s dissenters, but he addressed the argument that the court was creating a constitutional right. The right to marriage is fundamental, he said. The difference is society’s evolving view of gay people and their rights, he said.

“The limitation of marriage to opposite-sex couples may long have seemed natural and just, but its inconsistency with the central meaning of the fundamental right to marry is now manifest,” he wrote. “With that knowledge must come the recognition that laws excluding same-sex couples from the marriage right impose stigma and injury of the kind prohibited by our basic charter."

As in previous decisions, Kennedy did not spell out how courts should scrutinize laws that treated gays differently. But Mary Bonauto, who argued the case for gay plaintiffs at the Supreme Court, said that message from Kennedy's combined opinions "is one of inclusion: Stop making rules for gay people."

Scalia was a sharp critic of Kennedy's style, saying it was "as pretentious as its content is egotistic."

"The Supreme Court of the United States has descended from the disciplined legal reasoning of John Marshall and Joseph Story to the mystical aphorisms of the fortune cookie," Scalia wrote.

Roberts wrote a lengthy dissent that was a point-by-point takedown of the majority opinion. Gay activists had wondered whether the 60-year-old justice might take note of the increasing public support for same-sex marriage and find a way to join the majority on what they called the "right side of history."

But he and the other dissenters said the question was not whether same-sex marriage was a good idea, but who should decide.

"The court invalidates the marriage laws of more than half the states and orders the transformation of a social institution that has formed the basis of human society for millennia, for the Kalahari Bushmen and the Han Chinese, the Carthaginians and the Aztecs," Roberts wrote. "Just who do we think we are?"

Roberts rejected a comparison to Loving v. Virginia, in which the court struck down bans on interracial marriage. That did not change the age-old definition of marriage as between a man and a woman, he said. He raised concerns that the decision could lead to polygamous marriages — he mentioned a married threesome of lesbians called a "throuple."

He noted that voters and legislators in only 11 states had authorized same-sex marriages, and said it was better for gay marriage to be adopted through the democratic process than by judicial order. He said religious leaders could take little comfort from the majority opinion that their beliefs would be respected.

That theme was picked up by Alito in his dissent. He said there could be "bitter and lasting wounds" from the decision and warned that the decision will be "exploited by those who are determined to stamp out every vestige of dissent."

The questions raised in the cases decided Friday were left unanswered in 2013, when the justices last confronted the issue of same-sex marriage. A slim majority of the court said at the time that a key portion of the Defense of Marriage Act — withholding the federal government's recognition of same-sex marriages — was unconstitutional. In a separate case that year, the court said procedural issues kept it from answering the constitutional question in a case from California but allowed same-sex marriages to resume in that state.

Since then, courts across the nation — with the notable exception of the Cincinnati-based federal appeals court that left intact the restrictions in the four states at issue — have struck down a string of state prohibitions on same-sex marriage, many of them passed by voters in referendums.

Gay marriage ruling was 50 years in the making — wit h important Texas ties // Dallas News // Michael A. Lindenberger – June 26, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WASHINGTON — In explaining his decision to require every state in America to allow gay couples to marry, Justice Anthony Kennedy said some things are simply too important to be left to the hands of voters.

“Of course, the Constitution contemplates that democracy is the appropriate process for change, so long as that process does not abridge fundamental rights,” he wrote in his groundbreaking and deeply divisive majority opinion.

And yet, Friday’s history-making ruling was one the country largely got ready for in less than half a century, thanks to a sometimes painful struggle by gay and lesbian Americans.

In the summer of 1969, a small crowd of angry onlookers — drag queens and people living on the streets among them — clashed with New York police as they hauled people out of the Stonewall Inn and into waiting paddy wagons for, essentially, the crime of being gay in a bar. What followed were several days of riots, hundreds of arrests, and the birth of the modern gay rights movement.

From Stonewall to the Supreme Court, there is a straight line showcasing the rise of gay rights and the fading potency of the traditional, conservative moral authority that has warned, and still warns, that gay marriage could mean society’s undoing.

The line crosses through Texas in an important way. Justices, Kennedy said, had often been cautious when dealing with advances in human rights to its citizens, and those delays harmed the people affected in ways that weren’t undone years later when other decisions changed the law. “Dignitary wounds cannot always be healed with the stroke of a pen.”

He was in part referring to his own role 12 years ago, when he authored the Lawrence vs. Texas ruling in which a six-person majority upended precedent and ruled that laws making gay sex illegal could not stand.

Gay marriage, of course, was illegal everywhere in America, and not a single national politician of either party had ever suggested there was anything wrong with that. Many gay rights advocates felt marriage, if it were to ever come, was decades away.

But the Texas case was a fundamental turning point.

About two hours past sunset on Sept. 17, 1998, the first night of the year’s longest heat wave, John Lawrence’s legal troubles began. An acquaintance was angry because he thought Lawrence was having an affair with his lover, a younger man named Tyron Garner.

Shortly after 10:30 p.m., the acquaintance walked out of Lawrence’s apartment and called the police to make a false report. In the flush of jealousy, he told them an angry black man was waving a gun and shouting at the neighbors.

Officers barged in minutes later, finding an undressed Lawrence in his bed, Garner sitting on a couch nearby and another man inside — but no gun.

They were arrested for violating Texas’ law against having gay sex, taken to jail and released early the next morning. They’d eventually be convicted and fined $200. (The man who made called about the gun was charged with making a false report.)

“John and Tyron were just regular guys who wound up being arrested and charged with homosexual conduct,” said lawyer Suzanne Goldberg, a Columbia law professor who in 1998 was a lawyer for Lambda Legal Defense Fund who helped represent the pair.

“It would mean coming out publicly to the people they worked with and to their families,” Goldberg said. “Neither had planned on taking the case to the U.S. Supreme Court. But they both understood the important potential of their case, and they were courageous in deciding to pursue it.”

“I don’t know that they expected, that any of us expected, then that their pictures would end being splashed around the globe.”

What made the case worth fighting for gay legal activists was the tremendous power the relatively minor — and often unenforced — statutes against gay sex carried in other areas of gay life.

“In states like Texas that had these sodomy laws on the books, there was a very strong barrier to being out,” recalled Washington lawyer Paul Smith, who would argue successfully Lawrence’s case before the Supreme Court in 2003. “If you were an out person you could lose your jobs, custody of your kids, and people could refuse to rent to same-sex couples — all on the basis that admitting you were gay was basically admitting that you were a criminal.”

String of cases

But as for gay marriage, in 1998 it was still illegal everywhere.

A string of cases brought by couples who were denied licenses had entered the courts in the years immediately after the Stonewall Inn riots, as new organizations such as the Gay Liberation Front began to slowly move gay advocacy out of the shadows. Cases were filed — and lost — in Kentucky, Minnesota and elsewhere.

In Texas, a couple was granted a marriage license only to face an immediate backlash — including threats of prosecution — once officials learned that the blushing bride had been a gay man in drag. The license wasn’t honored.

Only one of the cases, involving a Minneapolis couple, reached the Supreme Court, in 1972. The justices heard no arguments and dispensed with it in a single sentence.

But five years before Lawrence and Garner were arrested, Hawaii’s top court opened the door to gay marriage by a crack. In 1993, the Hawaii Supreme Court sent a case brought by a gay couple back to the trial court with new instructions: For the first time, the state would have to prove that its denial of a marriage license to a gay couple could be justified.

State and federal officials had rushed to slam shut that possibility.

In 1996, President Bill Clinton signed the widely popular Defense of Marriage Act, making it illegal for the federal government to treat gay couples as married, whether or not Hawaii or another state issued them a license. The law also meant that no state would have to recognize a gay marriage performed in another state.

Two years later, Hawaiians voted to bar gay marriage, rendering moot the ongoing trial from 1993. Voters in Alaska followed suit the same year.

But the people who were thinking most about the issue were the same ones who were fighting hardest to keep laws like the Texas anti-sodomy statute on the books.

That connection had been on the minds of the lawyers and the justices the first time the Supreme Court confronted the question of gay sex laws, in a 1986 Georgia case.

“This court will quite soon be confronted with questions concerning the legitimacy of statutes which prohibit polygamy, homosexual same-sex marriage, consensual incest, prostitution, fornication, adultery” and other horrors if it decriminalizes gay sex, warned the lawyer for Georgia.

The justices were persuaded.

“Respondent would have us announce … a fundamental right to engage in homosexual sodomy. This we are quite unwilling to do,” Justice Byron White wrote in his 5-4 majority opinion.

Scalia’s dissent

Seventeen years later, the court changed its mind, and ruled in favor of Lawrence and Garner. That sent Justice Antonin Scalia fuming. He read his scathing dissent word for word from the bench.

“It is clear from this that the court has taken sides in the culture war, departing from its role of assuring, as neutral observer, that the democratic rules of engagement are observed,” Scalia said. “Many Americans do not want persons who openly engage in homosexual conduct as partners in their business, as scoutmasters for their children, as teachers in their children’s schools, or as boarders in their home.”

Echoing lawyer Hobbs from 17 year before, he said the arrival at the court of arguments for gay marriage would only be a matter of time.

He was no less disgusted on Friday, when he wrote that the court’s decision amounted to tyranny. “It is not of special importance to me what the law says about marriage. It is of overwhelming importance, however, who it is that rules me. Today’s decree says that my Ruler, and the Ruler of 320 million Americans coast-to-coast, is a majority of the nine lawyers on the Supreme Court.”

Whatever one thinks of Scalia’s rhetorical bursts, it’s only fair to note this about his 2003 predictions: He was absolutely right.

The first federal court decision making gay marriage legal came just months later, in Massachusetts. The first page of the opinion cited the ruling in Lawrence vs. Texas.

Smaller changes

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But what counted most, many scholars and some of the strongest opponents of gay marriage say, were the smaller, incremental changes in the way Americans looked at homosexuality and other moral issues.

Did the California Supreme Court's 2008 ruling in favor of gay marriage pave the way for Californians to marry? It's hard to say. Within months, voters in the overwhelmingly Democratic state went to the polls to change the state's constitution and bar same-sex marriages.

But the backlash triggered a response of its own. Hollywood icon Rob Reiner opened his check book, and his Rolodex, and bankrolled what would become Freedom to Marry, a national movement founded by activist Evan Wolfson. Slowly but surely the idea of gay marriage was being discussed everywhere.

"There was both the reality and perception of dramatic moral change on part of the American people," said the Rev. Albert Mohler, president of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary in Louisville, Ky. "You could see it even as the Fortune 500 companies saw that it was in their interests to join that moral revolution in their advertising."

By 2013, when the Supreme Court struck down part of the Defense of Marriage Act, conservatives were resigning themselves to defeat.

Harvard professor Michael Klarman, who has studied the link between judicial decisions and broad social change, said even the biggest court rulings are rarely the most important elements of that change.

"Thinking that those discrete landmark-seeming events are really driving anything long-term is, I think, a mistake," he said. Smaller, step-by-step changes in the way people see each other, the way individuals feel about gays in general, had much greater impact over time.

Gay people finally feeling free to come out, he said, is what made the biggest difference.

Theodore Olson doesn't disagree. The former top U.S. appellate lawyer under President George W. Bush, he joined with Demcoratic super-lawyer David Boies to sue California to force its hand on gay marriage.

"There was discrimination everywhere," he said. "Of course, it is not all gone. But the atmosphere has totally changed."

Proof of that came just hours after the court announced its decision. Standing in the Rose Garden, President Barack Obama said the decision arrived with the force of a thunderbolt, but grew out of decades of struggle.

"It is a consequence of the countless small acts of courage of millions of people across decades who stood up, who came out, talked to parents, parents who loved their children no matter what, folks who were willing to endure bullying and taunts, and stayed strong, and came to believe in themselves and who they were.

"And slowly made an entire country realize that love is love."

Terrorist Attacks in France, Tunisia and Kuwait Kill Dozens // NYT // Ben Hubbard – June 26, 2015

BEIRUT, Lebanon — In a matter of hours and on three different continents, militants carried out attacks on Friday that killed scores of civilians, horrified populations and raised thorny questions about the evolving nature of international terrorism and what can be done to fight it.

On the surface, the attacks appeared to be linked only by timing.

In France, a man stormed an American-owned chemical plant, decapitated one person and apparently tried to blow up the facility. In Tunisia, a gunman drew an assault rifle from a beach umbrella and killed at least 38 people at a seaside resort. And in Kuwait, a suicide bomber blew himself up inside a mosque during communal prayers, killing at least 25 Shiite worshipers.

The Islamic State group claimed responsibility for the attacks in Tunisia and Kuwait, according to statements on Twitter. But it almost did not matter for terrorism's global implications whether the three attacks were coordinated. Each in a different way underlined the difficulties of anticipating threats and protecting civilians from small-scale terrorist actions, whether in a mosque, at work or at the beach.

The attacks occurred at a time of fast evolution for the world's most dangerous terrorist organizations, which continue to find ways to strike and spread their ideology despite more than a decade of costly efforts by the United States and others to kill their leaders and deny them sanctuary.

The United States has killed leaders of Al Qaeda in Afghanistan, Yemen and elsewhere, but the group has maintained a string of branches and melded itself into local insurgencies. The Islamic State, also known as ISIS or ISIL, has worked on two levels, seeking to build its self-declared caliphate on captured territory in Iraq and Syria while inciting attacks abroad.

Fueling that expansion are civil wars and the collapse of state structures in Arab countries from Libya to Yemen that have opened up ungoverned spaces where jihadists thrive, while social media has given extremists a global megaphone to spread their message.

While officials in the three countries investigated the attacks, many noted that leaders of the Islamic State have repeatedly called for sympathizers to kill and sow mayhem at home.

Earlier this week, the spokesman for the Islamic State, Abu Mohammed al-Adnani, greeted the group's followers for Ramadan, telling them that acts during the Muslim holy month earned greater rewards in heaven.

"Muslims, embark and hasten toward jihad," Mr. Adnani said in an audio message. "O mujahedeen everywhere, rush and go to make Ramadan a month of disasters for the infidels."

The attacks targeted each country in a particularly sensitive spot.

Tunisia, widely hailed as the sole success of the Arab Spring uprisings that began more than four years ago, suffered a sharp blow to its tourism sector, a pillar of the local economy.

The bombing in Kuwait followed the pattern of similar attacks on Shiite mosques in Saudi Arabia and was aimed at sowing sectarian divisions in a country where Sunnis and Shiites serve together in top government bodies and open friction between the sects is uncommon.

The motivation behind the attack in France was less clear, although the beheading suggested that the perpetrator had at least been inspired by the Islamic State, which frequently propagandizes similar killings in the territories it occupies.

And because the day's events appeared to bear some of the infamous hallmarks of the Islamic State and its supporters, some analysts speculated that the attacks had been timed to mark the first anniversary of its declaration of a caliphate. Even if that is not the case, the SITE intelligence Group, which tracks extremist propaganda, said the attacks inspired "celebration from Twitter accounts of Jihadi fighters and supporters of the Islamic State."

Lina Khatib, director of the Carnegie Middle East Center in Beirut, said "We have entered a new jihadist era," adding that the Islamic State had used its international brand to establish sleeper cells abroad, whose actions were meant to advance its efforts to build a state.

"Everything in the end serves the purpose of strengthening the project of the Islamic State," she said.

United States intelligence and counterterrorism officials were scrambling Friday to assess the connections, if any, between the attacks in France, Kuwait and Tunisia. Officials said that if the assessment found that the attacks were linked, officials would seek to determine whether the Islamic State had actively directed, coordinated or inspired them.

Col. Steve Warren, a Pentagon spokesman, condemned the attacks, which he called "heinous." But there was no word yet on whether they were coordinated, he said. "We just don't know yet."

In claiming the Kuwait attack, the Islamic State called the suicide bomber "one of the knights of the Sunni people" and lauded him for killing Shiites, who are considered apostates in the group's hard interpretation of Islam.

The assault resembled others launched by the Islamic State recently on Shiite mosques in neighboring Saudi Arabia, prompting many to believe that the militant group is seeking to set off a sectarian war between Sunnis and Shiites.

Some Kuwaitis said that with sectarian tensions rising across the region, it was only a matter of time before they reached Kuwait.

"Ever since I heard about Qatif and the Shiite mosques there, I just had this feeling that we were next," said Bodour Behbehani, a Shiite graduate student in Kuwait City, recalling a mosque bombing last month near Qatif, a city in Saudi Arabia.

The American war on terrorism has taken many forms over the years. But the spread of such small-scale attacks highlighted what even American officials have called a failure to win the ideological — or information — war that feeds militancy and inspires recruits.

The challenge, analysts and government officials say, is to reorient a strategy centered on combat to one that challenges extremist groups on all fronts simultaneously: political, social, ideological and religious. A primary aim, they say, should be to win the information war and undermine the appeal of radical Islamist ideologies.

Such terrorist attacks have shattered the assumption that the Islamic State can be confined to territories it controls in the Middle East, said Bruce Hoffman, director of the Center for Security Studies at Georgetown University. Although Western governments can work to monitor those who might be plotting attacks, this will not solve their root cause.

"Chasing individuals is probably a fool's errand given the geographically disparate nature of the threat," Dr. Hoffman said. "There comes a point where you have to tackle the organization behind it."

And monitoring has limits. The authorities in Tunisia said the gunman there was a young Tunisian with no prior police record. The authorities in France said that the attacker arrested there had connections to radical Islamists but that surveillance of him stopped in 2008.

The Kuwaiti authorities did not identify the attacker in their country.

To fight the Islamic State, the United States has formed an international coalition that is bombing its fighters and their bases in Iraq and Syria, a process that President Obama has said seeks to degrade and destroy the group. But while the group has lost many fighters and some territory, Friday's attacks demonstrated the continued power of the jihadist movement to inspire attacks abroad by local actors.

It is an extraordinary coincidence that "all three attacks happened at the same day and time," said Brian Fishman, a counterterrorism research fellow at New America, a research organization in Washington. He said the attacks suggested that the focus on taking territory from the Islamic State could make the United States miss other ways it poses dangers.

"We can't get attached to a single metric for understanding this organization," he said.

ISIS claims to be behind deadly Tunisia attack // WaPo // Liz Sly – June 26, 2015

BEIRUT — Assailants beheaded, bombed and gunned down victims on three continents Friday, killing more than 60 people and raising fears that a global surge of terror strikes could be imminent.

There was initially no reason to believe the disparate attacks — at a factory in France, a beach resort in Tunisia and a mosque in Kuwait — were connected.

But then the Islamic State asserted responsibility for two of them, first the bombing in Kuwait in which 25 died and later, in a separate statement, the assault on the beach in Tunisia, which killed 39.

The second statement contained a warning that more attacks soon will follow: "Let them wait for the glad tidings of what will harm them in the coming days, Allah permitting," it said, referring to the "apostates" who had been the target of the assault.

The three incidents followed an appeal Tuesday from the Islamic State's spokesman, Abu Mohammed al-Adnani, for Muslims to mark the holy month of Ramadan by carrying out acts of "jihad," or holy war.

"Make Ramadan a month of disasters for the kuffar," meaning infidels, he said in the audiotaped address. He promised followers “tenfold” rewards in heaven if they died in such acts during the holy period, associated by most Muslims with fasting, prayer and peaceful reflection.

The attacks suggested that some may have heeded his words.

About 9:30 a.m. in the quaint town of Saint-Quentin-Fallavier in southern France, a deliveryman crashed a vehicle into a shed containing gas cylinders at an American-owned factory, causing an explosion. After the driver was caught by firefighters, police found a severed head on the factory fence flanked by two flags bearing Arabic inscriptions.

Minutes later and 3,000 miles away, a man wearing a suicide belt walked into a Shiite mosque in Kuwait City and detonated his explosives among worshipers gathered for Friday prayers, killing 25.

Two hours passed before at least one gunman burst into a Mediterranean beach resort in the Tunisian town of Sousse and randomly opened fire on bathers lounging under beach umbrellas, killing 39.

The Islamic State asserted responsibility for the attack in Kuwait, saying in a statement circulated on social media accounts that one of its members, Abu Suleiman al-Mowahid, targeted the mosque because it had been used to try to convert Sunni Muslims to the Shiite branch of Islam.

It was too early to say whether the Islamic State was connected to the French attack or whether the strike was conducted on behalf of the Islamic State or was inspired by its propaganda. A Pentagon spokesman, Col. Steve Warren, said U.S. officials are investigating possible links.

But the timing and geographical scope of the violent acts appeared likely to play into the Islamic State’s narrative that it is posing an ever-greater threat to global security, analysts said.

“For ISIS, terror is a strategy, a way to keep conveying a sense of expansion,” said Emile Hokayem, an analyst with the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies, using an acronym for the extremist group. “This is not a movement that’s on its last legs. It’s still there, seeking to impose and shape the agenda and be at the center of the conversation.”

In France, the gruesome killing caused jitters in a country still reeling from the Charlie Hebdo slayings in January, in which two gunmen mowed down staffers at a satirical newspaper in Paris.

French prosecutor François Molins said at a news conference that the man detained in Friday’s attack, identified as Yassin Salhi, 35, had periodically drawn the attention of French intelligence services between 2011 and 2014 because of his links with ultraconservative Muslims, known as Salafists, in Lyon. Security services had filed reports between 2006 and 2008 on the man’s radicalization, he said.

The victim found beheaded at the factory was the 54-year-old manager of the transportation firm that employed Salhi, the prosecutor said. In addition to the beheading, there were also two injuries in the explosion at the factory operated by Air Products, a global gas and chemical company based in Allentown, Pa.

French President François Hollande called it “a pure terrorist attack, especially inasmuch as a corpse has been found, decapitated with a message.”

He summoned security chiefs and placed security agencies in southeastern France on a state of high alert.

Tunisia also was still reeling from a recent terrorist attack — the assault by gunmen in March at the Bardo museum in the capital, Tunis, in which 22 people died. The bloodshed on the beach in Sousse is expected to further dent the North African country's vital tourism industry.

Witnesses described scenes of chaos as a gunman opened fire with an automatic rifle, sending sunbathers scrambling for cover amid beach umbrellas and sun beds. Tunisian authorities said the assailant was killed, and it was unclear whether more than one attacker was involved.

"A state of panic," said Tunisian journalist Moez Ben Gharbiya, describing the scene from the seaside town, a popular spot for European tourists about 90 miles south of Tunis.

The bombing in Kuwait fit a recent pattern in which the Islamic State has been targeting Shiite mosques in Saudi Arabia and Yemen.

The tactic echoes the way in which an earlier iteration of the group provoked sectarian strife in Iraq by relentlessly bombing Shiite mosques, and this appears to be the goal now, Hokayem said.

"By going after Shiites in Saudi and Kuwait, ISIS is playing a sophisticated game where it thrives off of existing sectarianism in the Sunni world," he said.

Kuwaitis, however, rallied behind the Shiites, a small but widely accepted minority in the tiny nation. The country's emir immediately visited the mosque, and Kuwaitis lined up to donate blood to the injured, who numbered more than 200, according to media reports in Kuwait.

"This criminal act on one of the houses of God is a desperate and wicked attempt to divide the unity of the Kuwaiti people, and it comes amid threats faced by the entire region," said Crown Prince Nawaf al-Ahmad al-Jaber al-Sabah in a statement on Kuwaiti state television.

World leaders elsewhere denounced the attacks.

The United States "condemns in the strongest terms the terrorist attacks" in the three countries, a White House statement said.

British Prime Minister David Cameron tweeted that he was "sickened by the attacks in Tunisia, France and Kuwait," and he summoned an emergency meeting of his security chiefs to assess the heightened threat.

Clinton act s on racial justice // Quad-City Times // Rep. Phyllis Thede – June 26, 2015

There isn't a soul in America who wasn't shocked by the massacre that occurred last week in Charleston.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yet again, a young man looking to do harm was able to acquire a gun and we must face how as a nation we continue to tolerate these mass shootings without acting. But last week's massacre also highlighted a topic that is too often overlooked and swept under the rug – the deep racist sentiments that persist in pockets of our society.

Over this past week, Hillary Clinton has consistently and persistently brought to the forefront a much-needed dialog about race.

It is all too easy for us to dismiss the murderer in South Carolina as crazy or fringe. As Clinton said this week, "our problem is not all kooks and Klansman. It's also in the cruel joke that goes unchallenged. It's in the off-hand comments about not wanting 'those people' in the neighborhood."

In Iowa, we know that racial disparities still exist. Iowa has the second highest percentage of incarceration of African Americans in the country with African American males making up 26 percent of the prison population despite only comprising about 3 percent of the state's population. In 2010 it was reported that three in four white Iowans own a home, which can only be said for three in every 10 black families. In education, 16 percent of black Iowans graduated college compared to 25 percent of white Iowans in 2010.

Scripture tells us that there is a time to keep silent and a time to speak out, a time break down and a time to build up. Now is the time to speak out and to build up. I applaud Hillary Clinton for bringing these issues to the forefront, and wholeheartedly believe she will help build a safer, more tolerant, and inclusive country.

12 Winning Brand Tweets After the Suprem e Court's Ruling on Same-Sex Marriage // Adweek // Lauren Johnon – June 26, 2015

When the Supreme Court ruled this morning to legalize same-sex marriage in all states, many marketers expectedly took to Twitter to celebrate.

Brands like Mastercard, Target and Ben & Jerry's were prepared for today's news with videos and photos that were ready to tweet, while others like YouTube seemed to whip up tweets on the fly. Hillary Clinton, who is running for president, got a huge reaction to her tweet, which can only help her campaign in winning over the liberal wing of the Democratic Party. And Gap, The White House and American Airlines have swapped out their regular Twitter avatars for themed ones.

Yesterday, MasterCard posted a video telling the story of a couple who won tickets to see Gwen Stefani, the brand's spokeswoman, in celebration of Pride Month. Today, the tweet is getting a boost with Promoted Tweets around the #LoveWins and #MarriageEquality hashtags—two of the buzziest topics on Twitter right now. And Maytag is owning the #SCOTUSMarriage hashtag.

Ignore the polls — trust fundamentals (The Hill 6/17/08)

Dennis was asked to write an article about transition for Sunday's Outlook, and he did it. He says that he argues that this transition cannot be "business as usual" and there cannot be a lull in efforts to stop Iran's nuclear program.

He is identified in the byline as someone who gives advice to BO.

I would have preferred Dennis not write this or at least not be publicly identified as one of our advisers, but we are where we are. If you all have serious heartburn, please let me know and I will go back at Dennis.

The release of "Obama Nation" fueled many discussions on the legitimacy of the book and its possible effects on the Obama campaign. Barack also received negative coverage for requiring DNC speech attendees to volunteer. With the DNC Convention nearing, several networks discussed the various planned speakers and rumors of Barack Obama's VP choice.

In other news, a shooting occurred at the Arkansas Democratic Party headquarters killing the State Party Chair Bill Gwatney. "Golden Boy" Michael Phelps continues to dominate the Olympics and media coverage. Controversy over the age of China's gymnastic team was also a hot topic.

Highlights:

Olbermann Blasts McCain On Randy Scheunemann, Conflicts of Interest, Inflammatory Rhetoric, Politicizing War
(MSNBC 8/13/08 8:12pm)

KEITH OLBERMANN: As war rages in Georgia, Russia's invasion of that tiny U.S. ally is raising new questions. Not just about the wisdom and competence of John McCain's foreign policy, but also about the integrity and the ethics that have shaped his position toward Russia. McCain's position may in fact have helped fuel this crisis. It certainly left today a foreign head of state making an extraordinary appeal for help from a capital virtually under siege and calling McCain out by name for not matching deeds to words. Our fifth story tonight the price for McCain's foreign policy possibly in this case a literal price. Did the nation of Georgia think it had bought John McCain. His rebuke at the hands of that nation's leader presently new details about McCain's top foreign policy adviser. On April 16th Russia announced it would establish legal ties with Georgia's two separatist regions, South Ossetia and Abkahzia, both friendly with Russia. Legitimizing them, a move widely seen as undermining Georgia' sovereignty there. The next day, the Washington Post now reports, Georgia sought help. Agreeing to pay $200,000 to a lobbying firm headed by this man, Randy Scheunemann to renew its contract with Scheunamann who is also and was also at the time McCain's top foreign policy adviser. That same day Scheunemann participated in crafting a strong statement by McCain taking Georgia's side, telling reporters quote we must not allow Russia to believe it has free hand. Did statements like that, purchased or not, give Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili to launch his military offensive in South Ossetia last Friday? Did it in turn become Russia's excuse for invading Georgia? Over the years Georgia has paid Scheunemann's firm $800,000. Scheunemann's company, the Associated Press reports today, has lobbied McCain and his staff on Saakashvili's behalf 49 separate times. With his capital under siege today, Saakasvili spoke like a man stuck only with a receipt. Asked about the U.S. response or lack thereof, he used the word appeasement and put at least partial blame for the crisis itself on President Bush […]

OLBERMANN: McCain responded this is no time to politicize the matter, even when it was pointed out he and his surrogate Joe Lieberman did exactly that just yesterday. […]

JONANTHAN ALTER: […] I do think it is really unseemly that Randy Scheunemann had this lobbying contract. It's always the second raters by the way who are foreign agents or lobbying for foreign governments- the top foreign policy people do it in a more subtle way, maybe they're consultants, they're not lobbyists. So this really stinks, the whole deal of him. Because you don't know who's he representing? Is he representing the interests of Georgia or the interests of the United States? And you never want to get into a situation like that and it's rather, I hate to say it, inexperienced maybe on John McCain's part to be putting up with this kind of thing. And also there's the question of whether in his rhetoric toward Putin, he's just been too inflammatory for American interest. […] The question though is one of subtly and moderation in one's approach to foreign policy. He's supposed to be the adult here. You know the mature foreign policy statesman. Those are the grounds on which he has asked us to elect him President. These are not well tempered measured remarks that he's been making. […]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CLARENCE PAGE: […] I'm just wondering Keith, how we would have felt if Barack Obama had said I speak for all of the people of the United States saying we are all Georgians now. That, some people would call that a little arrogant. […]

OLBERMANN: […] McCain said in the 21st century nations don't invade other nations. Do you suppose the irony of what he said was lost on Mr. McCain and does he assume nobodies going to draw the obvious parallel with his full support we invaded Iraq in 21st century and five years later we're still there?
PAGE: I think he's hoping we don't draw significance from it but I think we will. You just did. This is the kind of thing people are looking at in assessing John McCain.

McCain's Tough Stance on Russia Could be Due to Leftover Cold War Anger (CNN 08/13/08 8:23pm)
CAMPBELL BROWN: Some of the toughest talk about the Russian invasion of Georgia is coming from the campaign trail. Today Secretary of State Rice revealed that she has been in regular contact with both Barack Obama and with John McCain as this crisis unfolds. Now McCain of course, has been blasting the Russian's ever since the story broke last week and it has us thinking whether or not there might be something going on beyond the headlines, something a little more visceral for him. […]

TOM FOREMAN: There is no question that McCain has more hands on experience with Russia then Barack Obama does, and he's been presenting himself both as the voice of reason and of strength in this latest clash. But some foreign affairs experts are not buying it.

{Clip of Reagan]

FOREMAN: In the final years of the Soviet Union Ronald Reagan was thundering at the Russians, John McCain was a first term Senator cheering him on. And 21 years later he still distrusts Russia. […]

[Clip of McCain in Michigan]
JOHN MCCAIN: "And I am interested with good relations between the United States and Russia but in the 21st Century nations don't invade other nations."

FOREMAN: A tough line, especially from a supporter of the Iraq invasion.

JOHN MCCAIN: "The now Prime Minister of Russia, has been clear for a long time, that I've been concerned about Russian behavior in a broad variety of areas."

FOREMAN: And now listen to how this foreign policy expert is reacting.

CHARLES KUPCHAN: Well over the last few years McCain's views on Russia seem to be getting more and more confrontational. And I think he's really aligned himself with the far right, not with the centrist within the Republican Party and in some ways it seems almost that he either thinks the cold war is still on or wants it to return.

FOREMAN: McCain has been critical of efforts to reach out to Russia politically and economically, even those of President Bush. He has repeatedly attacked Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin, who is a former KGB boss.

MCCAIN: I looked into Mr. Putin's eyes and I saw three letters: a K, a G and a B.

FOREMAN: McCain wrote in foreign affairs magazine: "Today we see in Russia diminishing political freedoms, a leadership dominated by a clique of former intelligence officers. Efforts to bully democratic neighbors such as Georgia, and attempts to manipulate Europe's dependence on Russian oil and gas. " McCain has pushed to have Russia thrown out of the G8, that group of the worlds largest democracies formed to promote economic and political cooperation. He has fought to bring the Soviet Union's former republics into NATO, a military alliance of western powers formed to oppose Russia's military might.

KUPCHAN: I think it's arguably dangerous in the sense that by assuming that Russia may be more aggressive than it is, and by pushing Russia's back up against the wall, it's possible one can produce a self-proclaiming prophecy.

Dean Reynolds Discusses The New Tough McCain Campaign Tactics, Bush Style (CBS 08/13/08 6:40pm)
DEAN REYNOLDS: John McCain decried what he called partisan political sniping. [play clip]

JOHN MCCAIN: This isn't a time for partisan sniping between the campaigns. [end clip]

REYNOLDS: However the sharpest criticism has come from the surrogate standing next to McCain this afternoon. Attacking Barack Obama's stand on the crises as quote morally neutral, the sharper edge by his aides and the candidate is further evidence that the McCain campaign has changed. Gone are the bile green backdrops, and the hard to master teleprompter. [play clip]

MCCAIN: He has the audis-audacity to hope you don't mind. [end clip]

REYNOLDS: Replaced by splashier events, reminiscent of a previous Republican campaign for the White House. But it's more than staging, it's tone. The campaign theme is no longer reform, prosperity and peace. It's now Country First. What that means exactly was made clear Tuesday when an introductionary speaker framed the contest with Obama this way: [play clip]

JOE LIEBERMAN: Between one candidate, John McCain, with experience whose been tested in war and tried in peace, another candidate who has not. [end clip]

REYNOLDS: Remember, this was McCain months ago: [play clip]

MCCAIN: I pledge to conduct a respectful campaign. [end clip]

REYNOLDS: But now it frequently seems respect takes a backseat to ridicule. This attack [Hilton celebrity ad] ran during the Olympics.

KEN GOLDSTEIN: McCain ads are much more likely to be negative, and the Obama advertisements are much more likely to be positive.

REYNOLDS: And as often as McCain speaks out against partisanship, there was a broad Republican consensus that his tamer approach was not working. And that something new was needed. Something like we are seeing today.

Hardball Guests Discuss James Corsi Anti-Obama Book (MSNBC
RICH MASTERS: […] James Corsi is making no bones about it he wants to defeat Barack Obama. And for legitimate news organizations to give this guy any more credibility than what he deserves, is really really tough right now. It'd be almost laughable for a guy who has called Hillary Clinton a fat cow. This is a guy who fundamentally has no journalistic bones in his body. And the reason its number one right now is because there are a bunch of right wing think tanks and groups that have purchased this stuff to inflate those numbers so that we are talking about this right now. […]

DAVID SHUSTER: Charlie Black said the McCain campaign would make a different choice. Here's what Charlie Black said a month ago: "We don't want to talk about his patriotism and character, referring to Barack Obama. We concede that he is a patriot and a person of good character. That flies in the face of this book. […]

MASTERS: John McCain could have a Catholic problem right now. You've got Reverend Hagee who trashed the Catholic Church as the great Satan. Again, McCain didn't say one word about that. Now we've got this guy who again attacks Pope John Paul. I think John McCain needs to come out because McCain –these folks who are speaking maybe not on his behalf but he certainly hasn't disavowed this bunch of lies that is out there. Somebody has got to step up and say it and John McCain who is an American war hero, should have the courage to do what he did four years ago and condemn this pack of lies. […]

Shuster Notes McCain Hypocrisy For Working With Abramoff Connected Ralph Reed (MSNBC 08/13/08 7:30pm)
DAVID SHUSTER: Just a few years ago former Christian Coalition leader Ralph Reed was caught up in the Jack Abramoff lobbyist scandal. John McCain led a Senate investigation into the scandal, ripped the characters involved, and bragged about the people who are going to jail. Well, now it seems John McCain is now singing a different tune- at least about Ralph Reed. Reed is now a part of McCain's victory 2008 fundraising team. And Reed recently sent out an e-mail soliciting donations for McCain. Yes, if you want a politician to forgive and forget, help them collect some campaign cash.

- I have always put my country first from the time I took oath as a midshipman and POW and refused to go first, even though I could
- I'm excited about labor and management, GOP and Dem working together

Question and Answer

- 1Q) What role do you think technology plays in job growth in the US?
  - JM: I have no doubt about it. In 1960s, 15 of top industries in US have literally disappeared - through acquisition / mergers or they didn't keep up with technology. But also technology has made info accessible around the world in incredible ways. I went to Google one time and in their lobby they have a globe that shows all the places where ppl are using Google and it's incredible except in Africa, it's black. Info is power. US has most competitive and productive worker in world is in US. And I won't concede that that's not true. And ppl that question that make me wonder. Where did the internet come from? Besides Al Gore - and btw, I have great respect for him. Most of the great technological advances come out of USA, e.g. Bill Gates,etc. And we also have to reform education. Info technology is great but there are also downsides: terrorists use it; internet child porn is an evil we have to stop; and human trafficking. It's one of the greatest achievements in history of the world.

- 2Q) Mass transportation
    - JM: I just asked Jeff about it, so when GE introduces mass transit, please give me credit. I think what you're seeing here is an explosion of mass transit in USA. I can't tell you the price of oil is going to come down dramatically. To say it will ignores the reality that India and China are also competing for the supply. It's just a fundamental principle of economics. A lot of states are already doing it, e.g. AZ. If you go and do Maglev or other advanced technologies, if you can develop these technologies that will carry passengers further at lower cost, you'll see an explosion of mass transit. You're already seeing it b/t Dallas and Houston; Amtrak's sort of doing it in NE. You'll see it in W Coast, then further in. You'll now see in a matter of months or just years GE leading the way.

- 3Q) You mentioned clean coal, but US has 1 of biggest natural gas reserves in whole world. Should govt have incentive system for drilling natural gas?
    - JM: Liquid natural gas is great. I call my energy approach all-of-the-above, and Lex Project b/c of urgency. I want a permanent R&D, incl. for natural gas technology. I paid attn to T Boone Picken's plan of coupling wind and solar with drilling. Some differences too - we should drill offshore as a "bridge" until we're energy independent. To not do that is not fair to the lowest-income Americans. If we have reserves off our shores then by golly we ought to go get it. And we should get natural gas too - it's clean. And clean coal. And certainly solar is important, where technology has advanced - and GE is a part of that. Unleash the technology as obvi natural gas is a part of it.

- 4Q) Another Amtrak ordeR?
    - JM: Yes sir. I will do everything in my power. With all due respect to airlines, if you have to go from NYC to DC as I do often, if there's a cloud in the sky, you're likely to wait. ATC is broken. And the Acela was great for its time. I think it's time for another one.

- 5Q) Plans for 1st 90 days in DC?
    - JM: Call Tom Ridge from whatever vacation he is taking and get him to work. [applause] The POTUS's first obligation is ensuring nation is safe: getting natl security team together. If you need affirmation, look at the events in Georgia now. Make sure nation is safe is 1st priority of any Pres. I could give you a laundry list of things to address, but it's all tied to fundamental mission, which is restore trust and confidence in govt. 84% think country is on wrong track, 9% Cong approval. That means reform way we do business in govt; reform SS b/c it's going broke. Same thing with Medicare and a # of issues that out-of-control spending is leading to go broke. Like Tip O'Neill and Reagan, Dems and GOPs have to work together to fix SS. And jobs and jobs and jobs - that's my top priority.

- PA will be 1 of the battlegroudn states. So you'll be seeing a lot of me. We'll be telling ppl that we knwo you believe in 2nd Amendment and cherish religions is b/c they love USA. Great resevoir of patriotism and love of country is right here. That's why I love Ridge. Instead of finding way out of service after graduating from Harvard, he went to Vietnam. Proud to be in his company and yours.

Do we have some analysis of nightly news/front pages etc to make the case that this is not being covered heavily? Or at least enough based on day to day observation, i.e. not on front pages, not on nightly news or morning news...

While on the phone on a different topic, HRC raised Clinton Cash convo with Jake and me. It was a difficult conversation. So folks should be ready to explain why we don't think a video makes sense.

Moreover, my impression is she wants a much stronger response. Which means engaging more on details that we have to date not found in our interest to do so.

Just wanted to update folks.

Subject: Weekly Attacks/Responses

All,
We're going to start sharing this once a week, just to give you a better sense of the key attacks we're seeing and how we're responding. We will also be sharing with some of our key friends and allies, so they have resources to help push back as needed. Let us know if you have any questions.

WEEKLY HRC DEFENSE/GOP OFFENSE REPORT
July 13, 2015-July 17, 2015

Below are the major attacks and responses of the week:

ATTACKS- ON THE SHARING ECONOMY & UBER

- After Monday's economic framework speech, one major point of attack was on the sharing economy. Some media outlets such as TechCrunch and Mashable, as well as Republicans , misrepresented Hillary's comments as an attack on Uber and/or other emerging companies in the sharing economy.

RESPONSES

- HFA We posted this on Medium from CTO Steph Hannon to provide her take on the speech and on the sharing economy as a former Google executive. In the post, she clarified Hillary's view, highlighted her strong innovation record and reiterated Hillary's will to protect all workers.
- Thanks to outreach from tech
- On the day of Jeb Bush's Uber ride, we posted a fact-check, "Reality Checks on Uber," clarifying Hillary's stance on the sharing economy. It included posts, speeches and tweets from Sen. Warner, Fred Wilson (venture capitalist) and Shervin Pishevar (Uber advisor and board member—offering positive support thanks to outreach from digital and policy) reinforcing Hillary's message.

OFFENSE ON GOP

The Briefing posted an Uber-like graphic showing the ways in which Jeb Bush doesn't agree with Uber Correct the Record released an e-mail blast portraying Jeb Bush as an anti-Silicon Valley candidate, drawing strong contrast with Hillary's pro tech company record.

ATTACKS ON THE IRAN DEAL

- A number of Republicans criticized Hillary's role in and support of the Iran nuclear deal. For example:
  - @JebBush- The difference between @HillaryClinton and me is clear #irandeal
  - @ScottWalker-#IranDeal threatens US safety and exemplifies Obama-Clinton foreign policy: reward our enemies and undermine our true friends like Israel-SW. Walker also attached HRC on Israel and Iran at the Family Values Summit this weekend

RESPONSES

- Correct the Record blasted a fact-sheet on Hillary's Secretary of State record on leading the effort to impose crippling Iran sanctions and countering the Iran threat.
- The campaign released a well-received official statement on the Iran agreement, which is also posted on The Briefing
- HRC addressed Iran in a lengthy answer during the NH town hall
- Policy put together a doc with background and a short Q&A for friends and allies (attached). We distributed that to people going on the Sunday shows this weekend.

ATTACK - EMAILS

- Ongoing references to HRC's email practices;

RESPONSES

- HFA posted to the Briefing a lengthy Q&A document on Hillary's email practices, which includes all information the campaign or Hillary have highlighted in the past -- this product will give Hillary and campaign staff the ability to point reporters/observers/surrogates to a "one stop shop" on questions about her emails.

OTHER GOP OFFENSE

- In conjunction with Hillary's speech at NCLR in Missouri, HFA posted to the Briefing a detailed timeline of Hillary's swift denunciation of Trump's offensive comments followed by Republican foot-dragging on condemning them. Additionally, it featured contrast material on how Republican candidates are in lockstep with Trump on the substance of how to approach immigration.
- To augment Hillary's economic speech Monday, HFA produced three documents for the Briefing: 1) a robust contrast product on how Hillary's vision helps working/middle class Americans, while Republican candidates support a failed trickle-down theory; 2) a roundup of key positive reviews of Hillary's economic speech from outside validators; and 3) a detailed fact sheet explicating Hillary's profit-sharing proposal.

THE BIG IDEA:

— Donald Trump fares better in online and automated polls than in more traditional surveys conducted by live callers. A slight but statistically-significant gulf has stubbornly persisted over the six months since the billionaire Republican upended the race for the White House.

Dartmouth political scientist Kyle Dropp thinks "social desirability bias" is at play. In other words, people are afraid to tell another human being that they support the Republican because, even though they like him, they know about his controversial statements and do not want to be judged negatively.

This has happened before. Ronald Reagan and Arnold Schwarzenegger, for example, both underperformed in the polls when they were running for governor of California because a certain segment of the electorate did not want to publicly support an actor. (Reagan is viewed very differently today than he was in 1966.)

Dropp, the executive director of polling for Morning Consult, conducted a controlled study last week to explore which kinds of Republicans and right-leaning independents respond differently to an automated call, an internet survey and a real person on the other end of the line.

Overall, Trump pulled 38 percent in the internet poll and 32 percent in the live-caller poll. Jeb Bush, in contrast, garnered the same percentage online as on the phone. Most of the difference can be chalked up to education and engagement.

"Among adults with a bachelor's degree or postgraduate degree, Trump performs about 10 percentage points better online than via live telephone," Dropp writes this morning on the Consult. "And, among adults with some college, Trump performs more than 10 percentage points better online. Conversely, Republicans with a high school education or less favored Trump on the phone over online."

"There was also a split between engaged voters—people who say they are very interested in the election, or have previously voted in primaries or midterms—and the general registered voter population," he continues. "Trump's advantage in online polls compared with live telephone polling has a spread of eight to nine percentage points among these engaged voters." (See the methodology here .)

— Generally, Trump performs much better among those who are less educated and less informed. These blue-collar voters, like everyone else, are likely to have friends with similar backgrounds and views. Because support for Trump is widespread, there is less of a social stigma in backing him. Indeed, it may be a badge of honor.

Interestingly, Ben Carson tends to perform better in live-caller polls than in online polls. Social scientists believe this might be explained by Republicans who are eager to demonstrate, when speaking to another person on the phone, that they can support an African-American candidate for president. But they perhaps don't feel pressure to do that when they perceive that their response will be more anonymous.

The Post's in-house polling guru, Scott Clement, said other explanations should be considered for the divergence in Trump's numbers, "such as different ways respondents hear and read response options or the level of effort respondents give to answering questions with a live interviewer providing motivation vs. an automated or web survey."

"The big question is which mode is 'correct,' or better reflects respondents' true support," Clement emails.

A Trump spokeswoman did not respond to a request for comment.

— This is a global trend: Henry Olsen, a senior fellow at the Ethics and Public Policy Center, says that anti-immigration, working-class parties in Europe also do better in online polls than live-caller ones. "Support for immigration and globalization are perhaps the only political sentiments that unite elites from both business and the academy, from right and left," Olsen wrote in The Atlantic recently. "Openly supporting an anti-immigration candidate can risk social opprobrium, ridicule, or worse. In other words, for every group of vocal Trump supporters, there are probably a lot more who just don't advertise it."

— Not picked up in any of the forms of polling: Trump's lagging organization. "A successful ground game is crucial in Iowa because of the state's complicated method of caucus voting, but the Trump campaign has lagged in reaching some of its own benchmarks," the New York Times' Trip Gabriel reports . "Mr. Trump's Iowa director predicted that he would recruit a leader for each of the state's 1,681 Republican precincts by Thanksgiving. Instead, the first major training session for precinct leaders, heavily promoted in emails and conference calls, drew only about 80 people to West Des Moines last weekend, with about 50 participating online. … Mr. Trump has about 15 paid Iowa staff members, compared with 36 working for a 'super PAC' supporting Ben Carson that is organizing in his behalf in Iowa." Before the 2008 caucuses, Barack Obama had over 200 paid staff members in more than 60 offices across Iowa. Bloomberg's John McCormick reports from Iowa this morning that Trump supporters may need less guidance on how to caucus than widely assumed.

— The narrative – Evangelical elites coalescing behind Cruz over Rubio: Tom Hamburger scoops details of a post-Christmas retreat for Cruz with more than 100 evangelical leaders flying in to Cisco, Texas, on Dec. 28. The event includes a rally and concert but also hours of closed-door visiting time for Cruz with leading religious broadcasters, megachurch ministers and pastors from early states. The Cisco fly-in is one of three carefully-planned meetings that are already boosting Cruz with a critical constituency that he believes can make the difference for him in Iowa, South Carolina and the majority of the states voting and caucusing on Super Tuesday The Texas senator won the backing of a key evangelical coalition after a secret Dec. 7 meeting in which top national activists agreed to roll out a stream of endorsements, many timed for maximum impact between now and March 1.

WHILE YOU WERE SLEEPING:

— A car plowed into pedestrians on the sidewalk on the Las Vegas Strip last night, killing one person and injuring 37 people, six critically. The Review-Journal reports that a woman — in her 20's, apparently from Oregon and driving a 1996 Oldsmobile — was arrested shortly after the crash after fleeing the scene. The deputy police chief said terrorism has been ruled out, but that the crash is being investigated as intentional. "Police are getting a warrant for a blood test, but (they said) she wasn't exhibiting extreme impairment," the R-J relays. "A 3-year-old toddler in the car with the driver was unharmed."

— Miss Universe host Steve Harvey announced Miss Colombia as the pageant's winner, but it was actually Miss Philippines . It led to a bizarre ending where Miss Colombia had to take off the crown after she thought she won. The screw-up is a weird sort of vindication for Trump, who sold control of the pageant after NBC and Univision cut ties with him in June.

— The Wall Street Journal reports that Iranian hackers infiltrated the control system of a small dam less than 20 miles from New York City two years ago. "America's power grid, factories, pipelines, bridges and dams—all prime targets for digital armies—are sitting largely unprotected on the Internet," writes Danny Yadron . "The 2013 dam hack highlighted another challenge for America's digital defenses: the fog of cyberwar. Amid a mix of three-letter agencies, unclear Internet addresses and rules governing domestic surveillance, U.S. officials at first weren't able to determine where the hackers had infiltrated … Hackers are believed to have gained access to the dam through a cellular modem … Two people familiar with the incident said the summary refers to the Bowman Avenue Dam, a small structure used for flood control near Rye, N.Y. … Investigators said hackers didn't take control of the dam but probed the system." –

SECOND-DAY COVERAGE OF THE DEMOCRATIC DEBATE:

— Low ratings, as expected: The ABC debate got a 6.0 household rating . The previous Democratic debate, on CBS, got a 6.1 household rating, which equated to about 8.5 million viewers. Here's the debate summarized in three minutes .

— Hillary was late getting back on stage after a commercial break because a Martin O'Malley aide was using the sole bathroom backstage. "What viewers didn't know was the sole women's bathroom was a little further than the men's room from the stage," the Boston Globe's Annie Linskey reports. "And when the debate went to a long commercial break Clinton lost out to Lis Smith, the caffeine-guzzling deputy campaign manager for O'Malley. … A top Clinton staffer who was strategically posted outside the bathroom (presumably to avoid these kinds of situations) gave Smith a verbal OK to make a quick pit stop, according to one person familiar with the ladies' line. … When Clinton finally returned, moderator David Muir was already asking another candidate a question. But the audience applauded as the front-runner walked up to her erstwhile empty podium."

Trump criticized her for being off (not very "presidential," he claimed):

— Sanders complained on the Sunday shows that the DNC scheduled debates at times where there would be fewer viewers to help Clinton. (John Wagner)

— Republicans attacked Clinton for suggesting that the administration's strategy against ISIS is paying dividends. Chris Christie called Clinton "Ms. Happy Talk," saying she wants to only talk her way to the presidency. Trump faulted Clinton for suggestions ISIS supporters featured Trump in a recruitment video (they have not, though some have used his rhetoric to promote their agenda, says the Post Fact Checker)

Marco Rubio visits Giese Sheet Metal in Dubuque, Iowa, on Friday. (Nicki Kohl/Telegraph Herald via AP)

— "Smart strategy or overconfidence? Rubio plays hard-to-get with voters ," by Sean Sullivan and Karen Tumulty: "Marco Rubio no doubt wants to sit behind the big desk in the Oval Office. What is not so clear is how hard he is willing to work to get there. Republican activists — including many who appreciate Rubio's formidable political gifts and view him as the party's best hope for beating Clinton — say they are alarmed at his seeming disdain for the day-to-day grind of retail politics. Even some staunch supporters are anxious. 'Rubio has not put in the face time that he really needs to have, I don't think,' said Al Phillips, an influential South Carolina pastor who backs Rubio. 'I think that's been somewhat to his detriment.' That may be, as some of his allies fret privately, a sign of overconfidence in his own abilities… "Rubio's relative indifference toward wooing key activists contrasts with his eagerness to land top donors. His benefactors describe him as accessible and warm. … He recently secured support from billionaire hedge fund managers Paul Singer and Kenneth Griffin. He's believed to be the favorite to win over billionaire casino magnate Sheldon Adelson."

Justices at the 2013 State of the Union (Reuters/Charles Dharapak/Pool/Files)

"The Loyalty Effect" –> "Justices tend to agree with presidents that pick them — but stray later," by Robert Barnes: "Most members of the court make more decisions favorable to the president who brought them to the dance than they do to subsequent presidents, even those of the same party, according to a new study by two prominent Supreme Court experts. The law professors say what they call the 'loyalty effect' is evident even when other factors such as ideology and a personal relationship with the appointing president are taken into account. … That means that Democratic justices are less likely to vote for subsequent Democratic presidents, while the rate of variance for Republican nominees and subsequent Republican presidents is not as pronounced. … Judicial independence is a mainstay of American democracy, but politics plays a vital role in how a justice gets his or her job."

They may quote the Koran, but they're just thugs –> "The Islamic State creates a new type of jihadist: Part terrorist, part gangster," by Anthony Faiola and Souad Mekhennet: "The Islamic State is constructing an army of loyalists from Europe that includes an increasing number of street toughs and ex-cons as the nature of radicalization evolves in the era of the Caliphate. Rather than leave behind lives of crime, some adherents are using their illicit talents to finance recruiting rings and travel costs for foreign fighters even as their backgrounds give them potentially easier access to cash and weapons, posing a new kind of challenge to European authorities. … The picture now emerging of the Islamic State's machinations in Europe is distinct from the development of al-Qaeda, which relied heavily in its early years on ostensibly pious recruits and wealthy foreign sponsors."

Big setback for Big Oil –> "As decision nears, opposition builds to offshore drilling along Atlantic Coast," by Joby Warrick in Virginia Beach: "When then-Gov. Robert F. McDonnell (R) first pushed the idea in 2010, it was easy to find Virginians who favored oil and gas drilling along the Virginia coast, even in this tourism-dependent city of 450,000. The city council voted 8 to 3 that year in support of the giant offshore rigs, betting, along with the mayor, that 'there's going to be money made.' But that was before the Deepwater Horizon oil spill in the Gulf of Mexico and before oil prices began their historic slide. At its December meeting two weeks ago, the same city council abruptly reversed course, voting to rescind its 2010 resolution after some of the city's biggest business alliances campaigned against drilling. … "The Obama administration is expected to finalize by early spring a plan that could allow limited oil and gas development off the coasts of four Southeastern states —Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Georgia. All four have heavily supported drilling in the past. But lately, resistance to the plan appears to be growing, particularly in coastal towns where politicians and business leaders are expressing doubts about whether oil and gas can deliver the economic benefits the industry's backers claim."

— Rhode Island's freshman governor is a rising star, a Democrat willing to take on Big Labor without antagonizing state employees. The Post's editorial page editor, Fred Hiatt, today contrasts Gina Raimondo's willingness to take on tough problems with the congressional penchant for passing the buck. Four key paragraphs:

- "Raimondo stands out on a number of counts: a Democrat elected in a year when even Massachusetts was choosing a Republican governor; a woman, when 44 states are led by men; perhaps oddest of all, a Democratic reformer of state pensions . During four years as state treasurer, Raimondo infuriated Rhode Island's public employee unions, but she nonetheless went on to win the 2014 Democratic primary for governor and the general election."
- "After 18 months of negotiations, almost all of the unions agreed this year to a court settlement that preserves most of the reform. And Raimondo's first budget directed much of the savings (about $300 million per year) to programs that will help the next generation, including more prekindergarten classes, school construction and a scholarship fund for community college students."

- "Raimondo, who is backing Hillary Clinton for president, doesn't try to sell voters on fiscal responsibility for its own sake. She says she wants the Democratic Party to be the party of growth and innovation, to be pro-business and pro-government."
- "Rhode Island is tiny (just over 1 million people), and maybe politics that work there can't work on a larger stage. Still, you can't help wishing that a bit of her philosophy might rub off on Washington: 'Don't ignore big problems," she says, "and don't try to pretend that problems are smaller than they are.'"

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

— New York Times, "Ted Cruz sharpens tone while on tour, in nod to Donald Trump," by Matt Flegenheimer: "As he vaults toward the top of the Republican presidential field, leading some Iowa polls and climbing nationally, Mr. Cruz has taken care to compliment Donald J. Trump at every opportunity. And in the throes of a seven-day, 12-city swing to demonstrate strength beyond the early-voting states, Mr. Cruz's flattery seems at times to have taken a new form: imitation. In ways cosmetic and substantive, Mr. Cruz has in recent days seemed to more closely resemble the man he has been chasing — or, more precisely, quietly drafting behind — for months. … Perhaps most notably, Mr. Cruz has sharpened his already uncompromising language, eager to retain his own hold on popular anger against the political class, and to demonstrate conservative purity amid attacks from Rubio over immigration and national security policies. He has coined a new phrase, 'undocumented Democrats,' to describe those in the country illegally, and beefed up sections of his stump speech focused on immigration."

— New York Times, "Hospitality and gambling interests delay closing of billion-dollar tax loophole," by Eric Lipton and Liz Moyer: "In the span of a mere 11 days this month, $1 billion in future federal tax payments vanished. As congressional leaders were hastily braiding together a tax and spending bill of more than 2,000 pages, lobbyists swooped in to add 54 words that temporarily preserved a loophole sought by the hotel, restaurant and gambling industries, along with billionaire Wall Street investors, that allowed them to put real estate in trusts and avoid taxes. They won support from the top Senate Democrat, Harry Reid of Nevada, who responded to appeals from executives of casino companies, politically powerful players and huge employers in his state. And the lobbyists even helped draft the crucial language. The small changes, and the enormous windfall they generated, show the power of connected corporate lobbyists to alter a huge bill that is being put together with little time for lawmakers to consider. Throughout the legislation, there were thousands of other add-ons and hard to decipher tax changes."

— Politico, "Sanders data controversy spotlights powerful gatekeeper ," by Nancy Scola: "At the heart of the Bernie Sanders data mess is a firm that functions as the digital plumbing of the Democratic Party: NGP VAN. Democrats are nearly wholly dependent on it, which is why the breach — the company says it's the first in its nearly 20-year history — and the Sanders campaign's subsequent cutoff from the system is so rattling the party. While Sanders may have defused the flap by apologizing to Clinton during Saturday's debate … the extent of the damage done to both campaigns isn't yet clear. If nothing else, it's reminded Democrats of the risks of leaning so heavily on one private company to provide its technology infrastructure. How such an unsexy suite of software with an impenetrably acronymed name became both the fulcrum and the soul of Democratic politics — 'I [heart] the VAN' stickers are everywhere at gatherings of progressive field operatives — is a story of first-mover advantage and persistence."

MSNBC: “A silver lining in early attacks on Clinton?”

By Alex Seitz-Wald

As Hillary Clinton eases into an August pseudo-vacation, she — and the news-consuming public — may finally get a respite from the mud sling of her book tour. With non-stop attacks from her opponents and vigorous scrutiny from the media, the summer often felt like a one-woman presidential campaign, even though the real thing is more than a year off and Clinton has not yet said if she'll be a part of it.

Her opponents scored some blows, and she made a few notable stumbles of her own, but there could be a silver lining in the exhaustive early drubbing — her opponents might run out of new attacks to sell to an increasingly bored public.

Few people have been more scrutinized than the former first lady: Clinton has been the target of a hostile independent counsel with subpoena power in the 1990s, Republican opposition researchers during two Senate bids, and even supporters of fellow Democrat Barack Obama during the 2008 campaign cycle. The book tour tilled much of what ground remained. It's hard to find anything that isn't already old news.

"There's only one plausible reason why they're throwing the kitchen sink against her now — they're scared. They know if she runs, she wins. And that involves throwing every piece of oppo research at her now," said Adrienne Elrod of Correct the Record, the rapid response group that has become Clinton's main semi-official defender in the press.

In political dark arts, timing is critical and campaigns often wait for the right moment to release what they've dug up — usually close to Election Day, not two years out. Would team Clinton prefer to have the conservative FreeBeacon bring to light in June 2014 explosive never-before-heard audio of the former first lady discussing her legal defense of a child rapist, or for a mainstream publication to write about in June of 2016?

During the book tour, Clinton had the chance to fortify her defenses against a variety of criticism. "We are sharpening our responses to the incoming, it's our boot camp," said Tracy Sefl, a senior adviser to the pro-Clinton super PAC Ready for Hillary.

Nonetheless, the fact that the FreeBeacon (and the professional researcher the website hired) could find anything new at all suggests there may be more out there. "This idea that we've been wasting our best oppo in 2014 is wishful thinking on their part," said Tim Miller, one of Clinton's main antagonists and the executive director of the Republican super PAC America Rising, which has become the hub of opposition research for the Republican Party.

Shauna Daly spent plenty of time digging through Clinton archives as the deputy research director for Obama's 2008 campaign. While the Clinton paper trail is "endless," she said, the GOP's anti-Clinton message sounds more like a "cacophony" than a coherent and damaging attack. "Some people don't always have the best restraint," she added.

The newly fractured political infrastructure means that instead of official party organizations, where dirt is doled out strategically, attacks are now mostly driven by a plethora of new super PACs and ideological media outlets that compete with each other for donors and influence. The Republican National Committee, Democrats like to crack, has been reduced to sending out an intern dressed as a squirrel to stalk Clinton.

"I suspect that on the right, the funders want to see some bang for their buck. But, what they're doing feels frenetic, not strategic," said Sefl, who used to work as an opposition researcher for the Democratic National Committee.

Miller denies that, saying they're attacking Clinton because she's effectively running a presidential campaign — even if it's not called that. "Our only objective as an organization is to make sure our nominee is in the best position to defeat the Democratic nominee once we reach the general election in 2016," he said.

Ryan Williams, who had to defend Romney every day from attacks while serving as a spokesperson for the candidate's 2012 campaign, noted that the best anti-Clinton material has come from Clinton herself. "She's exposed herself as a very gaffe-prone candidate," he said, referring to her "dead broke" comment and others. "Before this book tour, we weren't even talking about Hillary Clinton as an elitist."

The downside of Clinton's perceived front-runner status is that every misstep she makes is news. Meanwhile, the rise of Twitter — which was not widely used during her last run — means those missteps are disseminated to political junkies instantaneously.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But most voters aren't Twitter junkies, and it's much harder to reach them, said Rodell Mollineau, who recently stepped down as president of American Bridge, the Democratic opposition research super PAC. Republicans are sending up trial balloons to see what works, he said, so Democrats need to be ready to pop them as they come.

"Their belief is that if they keep throwing it out and throwing out and throwing out, it will eventually get into the public consciousness. That takes time," he said.

That means you can expect to hear a lot more about Clinton's wealth, age, and speaking fees — not to mention Benghazi and the Russia "reset" — during the next two years, if she runs. Clinton has said she'll decide by the end of the year.

In her new memoir "Hard Choices," the former secretary of state wrote about wanting to do a round of media interviews in Pakistan at the nadir of U.S. relations with the country. "You'll be a punching bag," her staff warned her. Her response? "I smiled and replied, 'Punch away.' "

The Diplomat opinion: Amb. M. Osman Siddique: "The Economics of US Foreign Policy"

By M. Osman Siddique, the United States Ambassador to Fiji, Tonga, Nauru and Tuvalu from 1999-2001

August 7, 2014

[Subtitle:] U.S. foreign policy can help support the American economy, writes Ambassador M. Osman Siddique.

In an era of profound shifts and challenges in the global economy, how does the United States assert leadership in its foreign policy?

We must of course maintain the defense capability to protect ourselves and our national interests. But as recent misadventurous wars have demonstrated, military strength alone does not protect American interests or American lives. To maintain (and, in too many cases, to restore) our leadership, we must also make ourselves indispensable economic partners. While shared ideals and mutual respect connect nations, what brings nations together often are powerful economic ties. I have seen this firsthand while serving as a U.S. Ambassador, and throughout my career as an international businessman.

As secretary of state, Hillary Clinton knew this, too. She recognized that strong and long-lasting relationships between countries are not formed through isolated agreements. Rather, they endure when both parties involved are seeking greater respect, greater value, and greater confidence in what can they can accomplish together.

Turning this understanding into action, Secretary Clinton worked diligently during her tenure at the State Department to strengthen the U.S. economy and create American jobs. Often quietly and behind the scenes, she worked to create new economic opportunities for Americans by expanding the reach of American businesses into new markets. In 2013, Businessweek noted: "Clinton has argued that commercial diplomacy and the promotion of trade, long the neglected stepchildren of the foreign policy establishment, are central to U.S. strategic interests…. her work as a spokeswoman for American business is a less visible part of her legacy. Yet it may be the most durable."

One of the many examples of this work is a deal she helped secure between Boeing and Indonesia's Lion Air. Secretary Clinton encouraged Lion Air to purchase 240 new jets from Boeing, for a total of $21.7 billion. After this deal was secured, President Obama estimated that it would create over 100,000 new jobs in the United States. These are not short-term contracts, but rather jobs that will sustain hardworking American families for years.

Her economic diplomacy went well beyond supporting large American corporations. She was mindful that most American jobs are created by small businesses, and therefore worked relentlessly to open up global business opportunities for our small businesses and entrepreneurs. One of her signature initiatives was to mobilize Americans who were members of the diaspora community to reach out to their countries of origins and to work to advance and secure American economic interests as well as moral imperatives. Her seamless bridging of the economic, political and security dimensions of U.S. foreign policy has provided a more robust direction to our participation in the global economy.

Economic statecraft may not be the flashiest side of foreign policy, but it's important for economic development in America and around the world. That is why I have continued on in my career to conduct business here and abroad.

Over the years, America has wound its way through periods of high global engagement and eras when we've taken a more isolationist stance. But our world is a better place when public servants like Secretary Clinton strengthen both our foreign policy and economic ties with countries around the world. It is a clear win-win.

Newsday: "Hillary Rodham Clinton book signing draws fans -- and some critics -- to Huntington's Book Revue"

By Zachary R. Dowdy

August 6, 2014, 9:54 p.m. EDT

Laura Cerrano, 30, of Farmingdale waited on line for more than seven hours to meet Hillary Rodham Clinton, the former U.S. Secretary of State whose appearance and new memoir, "Hard Choices," drew more than 1,000 people onto Huntington's main drag Wednesday night.

Cerrano said she wanted to "be a part of history" in meeting Clinton, who ran for president in 2008 and is a potential 2016 candidate.

"It's an experience, once in a lifetime," she said, adding that she arrived at Huntington's Book Revue at 11 a.m., but did not get to shake Clinton's hand until after 6 p.m. "How often do you get to meet Hillary Clinton?"

All of the 1,200 books that the bookstore ordered were sold -- complete with Clinton's signature on them, said bookstore officials. And as many as 1,000 people snaked around the shelves snapping selfies and pictures of Clinton as well as the photographers and reporters invited there.

"I just love her," said Danielle Steinmetz, 23, of Wantagh. "She's such an inspiration and role model. It's great to finally meet her. It's a dream come true."

But not everyone who came to the book store on New York Avenue, north of Main Street, was a Clinton devotee.

"This is our statement to her: She lied. She's a liar," said Rosemarie Brady, of Dix Hills, who was among a group of about 50 people who held protest signs across the street from the event.

The demonstrators lined New York Avenue's east side, while those hoping to get a peek of Clinton waited on the west side of the street. The groups exchanged remarks -- sometimes loudly over the din of rush-hour traffic -- as a cadre of Suffolk police kept watch.

The demonstrators' signs had various messages: "Benghazi Does Matter" and "Support Our Troops Not Benghazi Hillary."

"We don't like her," Brady said. "We don't trust her. We're offended by her."

Some of the protesters were members of Oath Keepers, an organization that describes itself as "a nonpartisan association of current and formerly serving military, police, and first responders who pledge to fulfill the oath all military and police take to 'defend the Constitution against all enemies, foreign and domestic.' "

Tyrone Costa, the group's sergeant-at-arms for Suffolk County, said Clinton has a shoddy record.

"She didn't tell the truth when she made it on the tarmac in Croatia," he said, referring to a March 1996 trip Clinton made to Tuzla, Bosnia, as first lady. Clinton said she arrived amid gunfire at the airport, but a news crew that accompanied her on the trip documented no such hostilities.

Clinton's critics didn't stop longtime supporter Mike Prete, 63, of Smithtown from showing up. He said he has been impressed with Clinton's record as secretary of state, adding that he hopes she runs for president again.

"I've followed her career," said Prete, who retired five years ago from a job in the financial sector. "I'm hoping that she does run."

New York Daily News blog: Daily Politics: "'Ready For Hillary' dinner party hitting the Hamptons"

By Annie Karni

August 6, 2014, 7:54 p.m. EDT

Real estate investor Dan Neidich and his wife, philanthropist and Whitney Museum chairwoman Brooke Neidich, are hosting an A-list dinner party to raise money for a potential Hillary Clinton presidential bid on Friday, Aug. 22 in Wainscott, N.Y.

The soiree will be co-hosted by former Gov. Jon Corzine, Corzine's wife, Sharon; and Claude Wasserstein, the former wife of the late billionaire Bruce Wasserstein, among others.

Actress and activist Ashley Judd is billed as a special guest, alongside David Brock, founder of the Democratic rapid response team Correct the Record; and Craig Smith, a senior advisor for Ready for Hillary.

The dinner will be a "discussion about the work being done to lay the foundation for a potential Hillary Clinton presidential campaign," according to an invite obtained by The News.

The event will raise money for the Ready For Hillary PAC, which is building a grassroots movement of support for a potential Hillary Clinton presidential bid.

The invite does not list ticket prices, but Ready for Hillary voluntarily caps donors at $25,000.

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "Hillary Clinton has finally almost passed Bob Gates in book sales"

By Philip Bump

August 6, 2014, 4:51 p.m. EDT

Remember Hillary Clinton's book? For weeks, "Hard Choices" was the talk of the town, and not always because the rollout was going so smoothly.

Before the first week's sales numbers were out, there were rumblings that sales wouldn't hit public expectations -- certainly landing well short of sales of "Living History," her previous autobiography, but perhaps even missing lower targets. One Clinton advisor suggested to Politico that the book be compared to former defense secretary Bob Gates' book "Duty." Which we did, and the comparison wasn't great: "Duty" had outsold "Hard Choices" handily in total volume, and it wasn't clear when Clinton would catch up.

Now it is. This next week, probably.

We got updated sales numbers from Nielsen BookScan, tracking only hardcover sales of the books, and mixed in a number of other prominent political books from the year to see what we got. At long last, Clinton's book is on the brink of passing Gates' -- thanks to a higher average weekly sales total. (Which is to be expected; since sales taper off over time, Gates' book having been out longer means more weeks with lower sales, dragging the average down.)

The books we decided to compare, in addition to the two mentioned above:

Ben Carson's "One Nation"

Dinesh D'Souza's "America" (which has had its own sales troubles)

Daniel Halper's "Clinton, Inc."

Ed Klein's "Blood Feud"

Elizabeth Warren's "A Fighting Chance"

And, lo:

[GRAPHS OF TOTAL BOOK SALES AND BOOK SALES BY WEEK]

There you go. Still in second place, but clearly not for long. At long last, the Clinton advisor's early optimism is about to bear fruit.

Washington Times: “Scaife funeral proves philanthropy trumps politics”

By R. Emmett Tyrrell Jr.

August 6, 2014

One would never guess who attended Dick Scaife’s memorial service in the Pennsylvania countryside last week. Scaife has been referred to as the “father of modern conservatism.”

In his lifetime, he donated a fortune across a whole range of philanthropic endeavors, from the arts to medical research to politics — conservative politics. His conservative causes were very elevated — sophisticated thinks tanks, professorial chairs, intellectual reviews — but also at times they were very partisan. In the 1990s, Scaife was a leading opponent of Bill Clinton, and he frequently drew blood. When Hillary Rodham Clinton spoke of the “vast right-wing conspiracy” she doubtless had him in mind.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yet at the memorial service, standing there with the conservative chieftains was a lone Democrat, Mr. Clinton, yes, the very same. The 42nd president not only put in an appearance, but he actually spoke on Dick Scaife's behalf, saying, "Our political differences, our philosophical differences, our religious differences, our racial and ethnic differences, they're important . They help us to define who we are. But they don't have to keep us at arm's length from others." And he concluded, "I think the counterintuitive friendship we formed is a good symbol of Richard Mellon Scaife's legacy . He fought as hard as he could for what he believed, but he never thought he had to be blind or deaf" to reviewing his positions.

Yale Gutnick, Scaife's lawyer, explained both men's affinity best. Mr. Gutnick said they became friends because they "shared a mutual love of America." After all the battles of the 1990s, they came together for the country they loved, Scaife giving more than $100,000 to Mr. Clinton's foundation for the victims of AIDS. Scaife was a great philanthropist. Mr. Clinton is learning. Scaife had said that of all the people he wanted to have speak at his funeral, he wanted the former president. They had buried the hatchet.

So if philanthropy can bring together Dick Scaife and Bill Clinton in a celebration of America, how does one explain the bitter denunciations of the Brothers Koch, who are at the very pinnacle of philanthropy themselves? This week The Wall Street Journal and The Washington Times have both featured pieces about the truly astonishing invective that has been hurled at the Kochs for philanthropic acts that have absolutely nothing to do with politics. The Kochs have separated their support for conservative-libertarian causes, which can be simply educational, and for the Tea Party, which is obviously more partisan, from their philanthropy of a nonpolitical nature. It has not quieted their critics, not even when the philanthropy was for the arts or for minority education.

Consider David Koch, who lives in New York City. Recently, he gave $100 million to the New York-Presbyterian Hospital. He has donated $20 million to the American Museum of Natural History and another $100 million to the City Center of Music & Drama. In 2012, he gave $10 million to the Mount Sinai Medical Center and $65 million to the Metropolitan Museum of Art. He has also given money to his alma mater, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, to the American Ballet Theatre, and to Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center. Of course, many New Yorkers have been grateful. Yet there are the noisy critics. Two unions called rallies against David Koch's donations to New York-Presbyterian Hospital, citing the Koch brothers' opposition to Obamacare. Apparently, the Kochs are not allowed to have ideas on medical policy, if they are going to enjoy the privilege of giving money to medical care.

More recently, the brothers gave a $25 million donation to the United Negro College Fund, the fund's fifth-largest donation in history. Armstrong Williams tells us in The Washington Times that the grant was greeted with hysteria. Harry Belafonte called it the gift of "white supremacists." Lee Saunders, head of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, broke off relations with the United Negro College Fund, and Twitter reverberated with ignorant jeremiads against "UNCF literally sell[ing] 'their soul to the devil,' accepting checks from the Koch Brothers without knowing their evil history."

In a day when Bill Clinton and Dick Scaife can smoke the peace pipe, what explains this sort of uncivilized outburst against generous nonpolitical philanthropy? It is irrational and hateful. Yet that is where our politics are heading today. Bill Clinton and Dick Scaife are the exceptions. The response to the Koch brothers is more normative and, frankly, it worries me.

MSNBC: "Ready for Warren heads to Iowa"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

August 6, 2014, 2:35 p.m. EDT

Ready for Warren, the new super PAC hoping to draft Massachusetts Democratic Sen. Elizabeth Warren into the 2016 presidential race, is headed to Iowa.

Erica Sagrans, the Democratic operative who founded the group, told msnbc she's traveling to the Iowa State Fair Thursday, where she and local volunteers will spend the rest of the week connecting with party officials and engaging grassroots supporters of the progressive senator. Eventually, the group hopes to hire an organizer on the ground in the first caucus state.

"We're showing people we're for real and building an organization in the early states," Sagrans said, adding that the group already has a strong base of volunteers in the state who have signed up via email and social media. “There’s going to be a lot enthusiasm for Warren in Iowa.”

Though Warren has repeatedly and emphatically insisted she isn’t running for president, the senator has put herself front and center this summer firing up progressives and campaigning for fellow Democratic women in hot U.S. Senate races. Warren supporters also point out that then-Sen. Barack Obama said the same thing in 2006 before challenging Hillary Clinton for the Democratic nomination in 2008. Obama upset Clinton in Iowa, where she came in third.

“We need a progressive champion in the race, whether that’s Warren or somebody else,” said Sagrans, a former staffer on Obama’s reelection campaign.

The group, which launched in July during the Netroots Nation Conference in Detroit, recently started accepting donations on their website. It’s also in the process of putting together a national finance council to solicit larger contributions, and may release the names of its bigger donors in order to promote transparency.

For this year, Ready for Warren hopes to get involved in congressional midterm races by supporting candidates who have similar views as Warren’s and for whom the senator has campaigned. On August 28th, the super PAC will be holding house parties across the country to build support.

Former Secretary of State Clinton has had her own well-funded draft campaign for more than a year and a half, which served as a model for Ready for Warren. Clinton has said she will decide if she’s running by the end of the year.

Washington Post: “On the trail in Kentucky, Bill Clinton gets practice playing second fiddle”

By Ben Terris

August 6, 2014, 7:59 p.m. EDT

Katy Perry’s “Roar” blasts through the speakers in this downtown Lexington mansion-turned-event space. The song has the power of summoning Alison Lundergan Grimes at events like these, and just like that she appears from behind a blue curtain. The crowd is especially raucous today, because this time former president Bill Clinton appears beside Grimes, the Kentucky Democrat who is aiming to unseat Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell. Clinton bites his lower lip into his familiar smirk, waves to the standing crowd. Then he sits, and it’s like he isn’t there.

The crowd at the Wednesday lunch event, made up of the upper echelon of Kentucky Democratic politics (including three former governors, the current one, and the one Democrat who has announced his intent to run for that office in 2015) takes a moment from picking at their chocolate cheesecake topped with caramel and specks of mint to laugh.

Clinton has never been at a loss for words. But at two stops across the state Wednesday in support of Grimes, he got some good practice at playing second fiddle.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If the day felt like a trial run at campaigning, should his wife choose to seek the presidency in 2016, he brought it upon himself. At both events he mentioned Hillary at the outset, thanking the state for voting for her in the 2008 Democratic primary against Barack Obama.

"I really do love Kentucky," Clinton says, his voice hoarse, giving him the added benefit of sounding like he's choked up with emotion. "When people said Hillary was a washed-up candidate, you voted for her by 37 points. I appreciate that. Not that I was following too closely."

After the morning event at the mansion — where tickets started at $200 and which included an operatic performance of "My Old Kentucky Home" — Clinton and the Grimes team hopped on a little private plane and flew to Hazard, in the coal country of Eastern Kentucky. They were met by more than 1,000 people. The crowd included some miners from the western part of the state who had been bused in by the United Mine Workers of America, which has endorsed Grimes. So many had turned out, in fact, that not everyone could make it into the auditorium.

"There's room for chairs, but the fire marshal said no more people can come in," campaign manager Jonathan Hurst says plaintively to the line snaking around the outside of the Hal Rogers Center.

One family drove five hours to be there, another complains that an 88-year-old man shouldn't be stuck out in the heat.

"The fire marshal? Hell, he's from Hazard," says Jordan Whitaker, a fourth-generation miner who wanted to see Clinton. He remembers being a kid back in 2000 when Clinton last visited the area. The president shook his hand so hard he nearly fell off his mother's lap.

Inside, Clinton makes use of an oft-repeated McConnell line that it was not the senator's job to bring jobs to Kentucky.

"When Hillary was the senator from New York, she was virtually unopposed when she ran for reelection," he tells members in Hazard, asking them to pipe down when they erupt into cheers. "Because the Republican area of our state, Upstate New York which was like Eastern Kentucky … thought she was the only public official that had an economic development plan for them

Onstage in Hazard, Clinton again sits behind Grimes as she speaks. The Hazard crowd out-whoops the morning mansion gathering, and the former president seems more animated. He pulls off an "avuncular-chic" look, gazing upon Grimes proudly as she galvanizes the gathering, chuckling at the jokes he had heard just hours earlier and fussing with his eyeglasses and some papers.

The role of political uncle is an easy one for Clinton in this case. He has known Grimes since she was young, having become friends with her father when Jerry Lundergan was the Democratic Party chairman in Kentucky and he was the governor of neighboring Arkansas.

There's a sentiment in the Grimes camp — rarely spoken on the record — that if President Obama weren't so unpopular in Kentucky, Grimes might be up by 10 points over McConnell. As it stands, all the polls have the race neck-and-neck. Meanwhile, Clinton, the last federally elected Democrat to win the state, remains a Kentucky favorite. And amid the raucous crowd — where people yelled, "We'd take you for a third term" and "I'm ready for Hillary" — it's easy to see why. He can speak the language.

In Hazard, standing in front members of the United Mine Workers of America, Clinton talks about crusading for the rights of miners suffering from black lung as a young lawyer. He says that fight is one of the things he is "most proud of" in his life, and dozens of men and women wearing UMW camo shirts with the tagline "We are everywhere" stand up in wild applause.

Eastern Kentucky has been decimated by job losses in the coal industry. The Obama administration's proposed regulations designed to cut coal plant emissions aren't a particular favorite in the area. During the campaign, the McConnell team has pointed out that the Environmental Protection Agency building is named after Clinton and that he has "applauded" Obama on the issue. The former president avoids any mention of this in his speech.

Instead, Clinton reminisces about the last time he came to Hazard, in 2000, to try and pass the a tax credit that would help rural areas.

"I'll never forget that day in Hazard. I'll never forget how hot it was. … You couldn't breathe, the air was so thick and hot. But there was a sense that America was on the move and that small towns and rural areas got to be a part of it."

Then, he holds up a small packet of papers, Grimes's jobs plan for Kentucky.

"It would be wrong to try and build a future for America that leaves rural America and small-town America out," he says, waving the packet. "Every page of this is about you."

After the speech he mingles inside a while, then goes outside to shake the hands of some of the people who didn't make it in. People shout his name — "Bill! Bill!" — and try to touch him. Selfies abound.

Nearby, a man sells "Hillary Clinton for President" buttons, one for $5 or three for $10.

"Is she running?" a woman asks him.

"Man, I hope so," says a man wearing a UMW shirt. "If she's anything like him."

"She has not declared, but we've talked to some people and think she's very close to it," the button-peddler says, stroking his long, brown beard.

"Okay, I'll take three."

Christian Science Monitor: "Bill Clinton factor: Can he tip Senate race to topple McConnell? (+video)"

By Francine Kiefer

August 6, 2014

[Subtitle:] Bill Clinton's campaign swing in Kentucky aims to give a boost to Democrat Alison Lundergan Grimes, who is slipping in the polls in a key Senate race.

In the most closely watched Senate race in the country, Bill Clinton is campaigning for Democrat Alison Lundergan Grimes in Kentucky on Wednesday.

Lucky Grimes.

It's not so easy to get the popular former president to come to your aid. Mr. Clinton's time is precious. He runs a global foundation. He's a highly sought-after speaker. And then there's the matter of his wife's potential presidential campaign.

So in this election cycle, when President Obama's name is mud in a red state like Kentucky, it helps to be an FOB (friend of Bill) if you want his support. Or to live in a state that could help Hillary Rodham Clinton in 2016. Ms. Grimes, who is in a tight race against Republican Senate minority leader Mitch McConnell, qualifies on both fronts.

Clinton was the last Democratic presidential candidate to win Kentucky in a presidential election – both times. His wife handily beat Mr. Obama there in the 2008 presidential primary.

In February, the former president raised more than $600,000 for Grimes at a Louisville fundraiser. Today, he's campaigning for her first in Lexington and then in Hazard, deep in depressed coal country. Coal is a tough issue for Grimes, because of Obama's "war on coal," as Senator McConnell calls it.

"It's not a big surprise that [Clinton's] campaigning" in Kentucky, says Jennifer Duffy, who tracks Senate races for the independent Cook Political Report. "It stems from a long friendship."

The bond began with Grimes's father, Jerry, and was forged back in the 1980s. That's when Mr. Lundergan – who shares a pull-yourself-up-by-your-bootstraps narrative with "Bubba" – was a delegate in the state legislature and chairman of the state Democratic Party. Clinton was governor of close-by Arkansas. During an event at his first presidential inaugural, a teenaged Alison handed the president a bouquet of roses at the Lincoln Memorial.

Now Clinton is trying to keep the bloom on the rose of his protégé, Kentucky's young secretary of state whom he encouraged to run. She's trailing McConnell by just 2 points, at 45 percent to 47 percent, according to the July Bluegrass Poll commissioned by Kentucky media.

With a poll margin of error at +/- 4.1 percent, the race is still a virtual tie, but Democrats are worried that she has fallen back in every Bluegrass poll since her February high, when she was up by 4 points.

"It is so close and there is plenty of time to reverse that trend," Democratic political consultant Danny Briscoe told the Courier Journal in Louisville, Ky. "But it shows that Mitch McConnell's attacks are working and she's going to have to respond better than she has so far."

Republicans need a net gain of six seats to take the Senate this year, and "Bill Clinton is going to be a fairly hot commodity and Hillary Clinton, too, depending on how much she wants to campaign in these fairly red states," says Kyle Kondick of the University of Virginia Center for Politics.

His value is in fundraising, lending credibility to candidates, and inspiring the base in states where Obama is not popular. "The kind of Clinton Democratic Party is something different from the Obama Democratic Party," says Mr. Kondick. "It's a little less obviously liberal."

Clinton's campaign events so far this campaign cycle include Democratic fundraisers in his home state of Arkansas (for James Lee Witt, former head of FEMA under Clinton, who is running for Congress; Patrick Henry Hays, longtime friend, also running for Congress; for former US Rep. Mike Ross, who drove for Clinton when he ran for a second term as governor, now running for governor himself; and for embattled Democratic Sen. Mark Pryor).

He's also headlined state Democratic Party fundraisers in Florida and Michigan – both battleground states that would be key to a Hillary Clinton win.

Political experts expect him to pick up the pace come fall. Indeed, the Grimes campaign expects him back in Kentucky and says he will feature in television ads.

Will all this make a difference? In Kentucky, actually, some political analysts have their doubts. Stuart Rothenberg has said that there is so much media coverage of the Kentucky race that voters will be able to make up their own minds – without needing to rely on a celebrity to do it for them.

Clinton's fundraiser and ad spot for his son-in-law's mother, former US Rep. Marjorie Margolies – who was trying to regain the seat she lost after casting the deciding vote for an unpopular Clinton spending plan – did not stop her from losing her primary in May

But Grimes can be heartened by this: The Clintons went all out for their friend Terry McAuliffe last year in a nail-biter race for Virginia governor. Mr. McAuliffe eked out a narrow victory – with a little help from his friends.

Louisville Courier-Journal (K.Y.): "Grimes, Bill Clinton stump in coal country"

By Mike Wynn

August 7, 2014, 2:37 a.m. EDT

HAZARD, Ky. – After working 33 years in an Eastern Kentucky coal mine, Cleo Tackett said he's seen a lot of politicians talk about coal jobs during elections, but he's still waiting for one who can help the region's depressed economy.

"We need somebody in there that will work to replace coal jobs," he said. "Our coal seams have gotten down to where they ain't 30 inches high. The rest of the country got 6 foot. Just do the math, we can't compete."

In a region hostile to the Obama administration, Democrat Alison Lundergan Grimes sought to appeal to Eastern Kentucky voters like Tackett on Wednesday as she appeared in Hazard with former President Bill Clinton and promised a crowd of more than 800 that she would stand up for coal — and miners.

It was a message clearly on voters' minds as they hoisted signs, screamed "Ditch Mitch," and cheered Grimes in her bid to unseat Republican Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell this November.

Eastern Kentucky has lost more than 7,000 coal jobs since 2011, and where Grimes spoke in Perry County, mining employment was down 20 percent last year, compared with 2012 — when more than 67 percent of local Democrats voted "uncommitted" in the primary election rather than support President Barack Obama.

But for more than an hour Wednesday, Grimes, Clinton and high-profile Kentucky Democrats slammed McConnell as an out-of-touch Washington insider who has failed to create or save any coal jobs.

And to the cheers of miners, they pledged that Grimes would serve as a "Clinton Democrat," supporting better wages, mine safety and health.

"One candidate believes it's about jobs and incomes … and the other believes a senator has no business trying to create jobs," Clinton said in a shot at McConnell. "Nobody can tell me it's not a senator's job, especially one with 30 years of experience."

Clinton also sought to distinguish between Grimes and the administration, noting Obama has only two more years in office while Grimes is seeking a six-year term. And he compared her to former Sen. Wendell Ford, who Clinton said, always voted for Kentucky first, but still worked with presidents he disagreed with.

Grimes, for her part, had the crowd chanting "Mitch McConnell" as she asked who has served in the Senate for years as thousands of coal jobs have disappeared and EPA regulations "have hit Kentucky hardest."

"Let's get something straight. senator, I am the pro-coal candidate in this race," Grimes said. "… I am the Kentucky candidate who will work to make sure we have a comprehensive mine safety policy as well as a commitment to our miners and their widows to get their black lung benefits."

She even borrowed one of Clinton's most famous lines: "It's the economy, stupid."

The McConnell campaign has made coal a central issue in the race, arguing that a vote for Grimes amounts to a vote for Obama's "anti-coal" policies.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McConnell's team released a statement Wednesday, taking aim at Clinton and arguing that the EPA headquarters even bears his name.

"It must not have occurred to Alison Lundergan Grimes that after Barack Obama declared the war on coal, he named the building tasked with executing his mission after the man she's bringing to Eastern Kentucky," McConnell spokeswoman Allison Moore said.

Clinton carried Kentucky twice while running for president, and he helped Hillary Clinton win more than 65 percent of the vote in Kentucky during her 2008 primary bid against Obama.

The United Mine Workers of America, which has endorsed Grimes, bused miners in for Wednesday's event — they wore camouflage shirts that read "we are everywhere." And union leaders say they hope to effect a "game change" for Grimes in Eastern Kentucky, running ads on her behalf this fall.

Meanwhile, Nancy Cade, a professor of history and political science at the nearby University of Pikeville, said it's unclear how much Clinton can help turn out voters in Eastern Kentucky.

"I think he can help the Grimes campaign," she said. "Whether it will be enough, I have my doubts."

Dennis Brooks, the county judge-executive in Wolfe County — and a Grimes supporter — agreed that she faces obstacles in the region. But he said Clinton's appearance generated lots of excitement.

"He's got a great name and he's just been good for our country," he said. "The words Bill Clinton will draw people out in Eastern Kentucky."

Sunshine Smoot, 35, a pediatrician from Breathitt County, who showed up to hear Clinton speak, said he carries clout in the area as "he was one of our most successful presidents in the past. We had a good economy under his reign."

For Tackett, 55, who described himself as a conservative Democrat, his support for Grimes stems from the belief she can find jobs to replace mining while protecting the coal jobs that remain.

He said many voters in the region are conservative because of beliefs on religion and abortion, but that the Democratic message on economic issues — and even health care — still resonates with people in Eastern Kentucky.

Tackett added that McConnell should have realized decades ago that changes were needed in the region's economy. So, he asked after hearing the speeches Wednesday, "why ain't he done nothin' to help this part of the country?"

THE STORY

Yesterday, the US said a friend of the terrorist who planned the Paris attacks was killed by an airstrike in Syria. The US says he was "actively planning additional attacks against the West."

BACK UP.

Last month, a series of terror attacks in Paris left 130 people dead. ISIS claimed responsibility, and Abdelhamid Abaaoud – the ringleader of the attacks – was killed in a police raid days later. Since then, two things have been going on: 1. Authorities have been tracking down any possible suspects linked to the attacks 2. the US-led coalition has been ramping up the fight against ISIS in Iraq and Syria.

WHAT'S THE LATEST?

Yesterday, the US said targeted airstrikes have killed 10 ISIS leaders in the past month. One of those leaders was a French national and the VIP friend of Abdelhamid Abaaoud.

Earlier this week, Iraqi forces reclaimed Ramadi – a key city in Iraq – from ISIS. So, it's been a good week in the fight against ISIS. But hold the champagne. There's still a long way to go before the US can put ISIS on ice.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOU SPILL WINE AT AN AWKWARD DINNER WITH YOUR BF'S PARENTS...

Could've done without that. Earlier this week, northern England was hit by a series of bad storms that caused massive flooding and damaged thousands of homes. Now, it's getting hit again by "Storm Frank." England's floods minister (yes, that's a real title) is warning that "a very bad situation" might be on the way. Helpful. Parts of Scotland, Ireland, and Wales are also on alert. The US Midwest can relate. It's been dealing with heavy rains and tornadoes since last week that have caused travel delays around the US, and now Missouri is prepping for more major flooding. Missouri's gov. has ordered evacuations along the Mississippi River and activated the National Guard. When it rains it pours.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOUR WEIRD UNCLE MAKES A CREEPY COMMENT ABOUT YOUR OUTFIT...

Ughhh. Yesterday, "Glee" actor Mark Salling (hint: the one with the mohawk) was arrested on child porn charges. He was a regular on the show for four seasons, but hasn't done much since. This isn't his first issue with the law. His ex-girlfriend once sued him for sexual battery, which got settled out of court. Don't think a Mr. Schue song is going to work in this situation.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOU FEEL A COLD COMING ON...

It could be worse. Even though the rest of the world has stopped compulsively reaching for Purell, West Africa has been dealing with Ebola all year. The number of cases has been winding down, and yesterday, Guinea was officially declared Ebola-free for the first time since March 2014. Cue the loud exhale. For the next few months, health workers will be watching closely for any new cases. Meanwhile, Sierra Leone was declared Ebola-free earlier this year, and Liberia has a few more days before it can make it official. The Ebola outbreak killed more than 11,000 people around the world, mostly in these West African countries. So now, they're finally almost out of the woods.

THING TO KNOW

Chip Kelly: Used to be the head coach of the Philadelphia Eagles. Until last night when he was fired. Possibly because he opted to let go of most of the team's star players as part of his own 'Chip Kelly formula'. He thought it could win the team a championship. Spoiler: that didn't work out too well.

Remarks By John McCain on Energy Security and Our National Security

June 23, 2008

ARLINGTON, VA -- U.S. Senator John McCain delivered the following remarks as prepared for delivery at a town hall meeting in Fresno, CA, today at 10:00 a.m. PDT (1:00 p.m. EDT):

Thank you all very much. I appreciate the kind introduction from Jim Woolsey, and the warm welcome to Fresno State. I'm here to listen about energy issues as well as to talk. So let me just offer a few ideas before we begin our discussion.

All across this state and nation, people are hurting because the price of gasoline is higher than it should be, and more than many folks can afford. Because of far-off events in the world oil market, a barrel of oil has more than doubled in a year. And the bad effects of that are spreading across our economy. The cost of business is rising, the cost of food and other essentials is rising, the whole cost of living is rising. What isn't rising is the value of your paychecks and the rate of America's economic growth. Back in the 1970's, they used to call this "stagflation." And it feels the same today, because the unwise policies of our government have left America's energy future in the control of others.

America imports about one third of its oil from Canada and Mexico and no one need worry about a reliance on friendly, stable neighbors, and partners in NAFTA. The Middle East and Venezuela are a different story. We import roughly a quarter of our oil from them, and they have a disproportionate impact on world prices. When we buy foreign oil from these and other sources, there are many consequences -- all of them far-reaching and none of them good. Worst of all, by relying on foreign oil, we enrich bad actors in the world, some of whom finance terrorists.

Some in Washington seem to think that we can still persuade OPEC to lower prices -- as if reason or cajolery had never been tried before. Others have even suggested suing OPEC -- as if we can litigate our way to energy security. But America is not going to meet this great challenge as a supplicant or a plaintiff. We are not going to meet it with words at all -- we are going to meet it with action. We're going to produce more, conserve more, and invent more. And to a large extent, this strategy hinges on innovations in the cars and trucks we drive.

Ninety-seven percent of transportation in America runs on oil. And of all that oil, about 60 percent is used in cars and trucks. Yet the CAFE standards we apply to automakers -- to increase the fuel efficiency of their cars -- are lightly enforced by a small fine. The result is that some companies don't even bother to observe CAFE standards. Instead they just write a check to the government and pass the cost along to you. Higher end auto companies like BMW, Porsche, and Mercedes employ some of the best engineering talent in the world. But that talent isn't put to the job of fuel efficiency, when the penalties are too small to encourage innovation. CAFE standards should serve large national goals in energy independence, not the purpose of small-time revenue collection.

Innovation in the use of alternative fuels in transportation presents the greatest opportunity for energy independence. At the moment, entrepreneurs and engineers are trying to figure out which among the various alternatives to oil works best. Alcohol-based fuels are the farthest along in both development and commercial use. Some, such as ethanol, are on the market now, and new sources of ethanol are on the horizon that will not require the use of so much cropland. Corn-based ethanol, thanks to the money and influence of lobbyists, has been a case study in the law of unintended consequences. Our government pays to subsidize corn-based ethanol even as it collects tariffs that prevent consumers from benefiting from other kinds of ethanol, such as sugarcane-based ethanol from Brazil. The result is that Americans take the financial hit coming and going. As taxpayers, we foot the bill for the enormous subsides paid to corn produ cers. And as consumers, we pay extra at the pump because of government barriers to cheaper products from abroad.

Here's a better way. Instead of playing favorites, our government should level the playing field for all alcohol fuels that break the monopoly of gasoline, lowering both gasoline prices and carbon emissions. And this can be done with a simple federal standard to hasten the conversion of all new vehicles in America to flex-fuel technology -- allowing drivers to use alcohol fuels instead of gas in their cars. Brazil went from about five to over 70 percent of all new vehicles with flex-fuel capacity. It did all that in just three years. Yet those same automakers that helped Brazil make the change say it will take them longer to reach the goal of 50 percent new flex-fuel vehicles for America. But I am confident they can do more, and do it faster, in the interest of our energy security. And if I am elected president, they will. Whether it takes a meeting with automakers during my first month in office, or my signature on an act of Congress, we will meet the goal of a swift conversion of American vehicles away from oil.

At the same time, smart policy can also help to broaden the market for energy-efficient cars. Right now we have a hodgepodge of incentives for the purchase of fuel-efficient cars. Different hybrids and natural-gas cars carry different incentives, ranging from a few hundreds dollars to four grand. They're the handiwork of lobbyists, with all the inconsistency and irrationality that involves.

My administration will issue a Clean Car Challenge to the automakers of America, in the form of a single and substantial tax credit based on the reduction of carbon emissions. For every automaker who can sell a zero-emissions car, we will commit a 5,000 dollar tax credit for each and every customer who buys that car. For other vehicles, whatever type they may be, the lower the carbon emissions, the higher the tax credit. And these large tax credits will be available to everyone -- not just to those who have an accountant to explain it to them.

Furthermore, in the quest for alternatives to oil, our government has thrown around enough money subsidizing special interests and excusing failure. From now on, we will encourage heroic efforts in engineering, and we will reward the greatest success.

I further propose we inspire the ingenuity and resolve of the American people by offering a $300 million prize for the development of a battery package that has the size, capacity, cost and power to leapfrog the commercially available plug-in hybrids or electric cars. This is one dollar for every man, woman and child in the U.S. -- a small price to pay for helping to break the back of our oil dependency -- and should deliver a power source at 30 percent of the current costs.

My friends, energy security is the great national challenge of our time. And rising to this challenge will take all of the vision, creativity, and resolve of which we are capable. The good news is, these qualities have never been in short supply. We are the country of Edison, Fulton, and two brothers named Wright. It was American ingenuity that took three brave men to the moon and brought them back. Think of all the highest scientific endeavors of our age -- the invention of the silicon chip, the creation of the Internet, the mapping of the human genome. In so many cases, you can draw a straight line back to American inventors, and often to the foresighted aid of the United States government.

For all the troubles and dangers our energy vulnerability presents, we know that we can overcome them, because we have overcome far worse problems and met far greater goals. Together, we Americans can achieve anything we set our minds to. I believe this about our country. I know this about our country. And now it is time to show those qualities once again.

Thank you.

Question and Answer

1 Q) I've been listening to the experts on the energy crisis -- they say speculators have caused prices to go up. How come Congress hasn't done anything about these speculators?

MCCAIN: I'm aware of that too -- but we don't know how much those speculator costs are actually driving up the cost of gas. But if there's anybody who took advantage of Americans for themselves, then they should be held accountable.

2 Q) What's your plan for bringing the troops home? What is your time-line?

MCCAIN: Would you like me to talk about energy and global warming as well? And by the way if I don't answer your question, you'll be able to follow up. Because that's what these town halls are all about -- the back and forth.

This war has been badly mishandled for the past four years. I went to Iraq and saw that and came back arguing for a new strategy. And our new strategy, I know, called the surge is succeeding. And let me tell you, I hate war. I believe that if we had done what many advocated -- set a date for withdrawal, we would have risked a wider war. Today the Iraqi government is functioning, but they have a way to go. The casualties and attacks are gone. Everything is in our favor, but we're not done. We still have work to do. So, I understand your frustrations and sorrow of the war. And I thank you for your commitment to peace. I am also committed to peace. I believe we will withdraw over time -- and I believe we will come home with victory and honor, without defeat.

FOLLOW-UP: For a country that's able to do all these wonderful things, I think that we are also a country that can show with empathy for other people of the world. We went over there and invaded when this country was of no threat to us. We went to war on a lie. We killed all these people over there, our 4,000 dead soldiers. We could have handled this in a much more peaceful way.

MCCAIN: Thank you for your opinion. I'd be happy to go over WMD's, etc. But I feel the important part of this debate is -- we are where we are and we need to figure out what to do NOW.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

3 Q) In relation to ANWR - do we still have the luxury to put the environment over our energy needs? Also if you still have that belief, why?

MCCAIN: I believe in the long-term, I believe that climate change is real. We have to go to green technology. The states should decide if they want to drill -- if California wants to do it, they should be able to. The moratorium on off-shore drilling should be lifted.

The problem I have with ANWR is that it is a pristine area and I'm not sure it can be done in an environmentally safe way.

Senator Obama says he doesn't support nuclear power -- I support nuclear power.

4 Q) What about alternative infrastructure?

MCCAIN: Absolutely and we have to provide those incentives. All of the alternate forms of energy - we should provide lots of incentives to pursue them.

5 Q) Are there any plans for making higher percentage ethanol available for U.S. citizens?

MCCAIN: I'll look into that. But let me reiterate, I want to do flex-fuel first. I want to see us to the E-85 standard.

FOLLOW-UP: What are your plans for hydrogen?

MCCAIN: Can I say you're very smart? Your parents investment in your education has been well-spent. There's a lot of challenges, but we have to continue to develop hydrogen solutions.

Oh and another thing. We are sitting on a lot of coal. Why don't we have more clean coal technology? And electric cars -- we need more of those. Right now, they're too expensive, but just like with cell phones, the cost will come down.

6 Q) The right to life issue is very important to me. Obama's vote against legislation for the child that was born alive after an unsuccessful abortion.

MCCAIN: I don't understand. I don't understand how someone could vote against a ban for partial-birth abortion. I believe in the rights of the born and the unborn.

Human rights extend around the globe.

7 Q) As a young person, my friends are defaulting to the democratic side without event researching. What are you going to do to sell your message to the younger community?

MCCAIN: I try to go to venues that young people use for the sources of information and knowledge -- like the Internet and Jon Stewart. I am going to give young Americans a safer and more secure America. I know how to reform Washington. I pursued Mr. Abramoff and his friends. I have fought for reform the entire time I've been in Congress. I'm going to fix government so you have a more prosperous future.

FOLLOW-UP: The price of oil has gone up as the dollar has fallen. Can you comment on that?

MCCAIN: My view is that we are in spiral. Our debt is rising, we're borrowing to pay our debts and we're importing what we can't afford. Our dependence on foreign oil is an economic one and an environmental one. You're right -- they are connected.

8 Q) What can Washington and you do to bring mass transportation to American towns?

MCCAIN: I think mass transportation is good. I think we have to focus on those areas where there's real need and a willingness of local authorities to contribute to building the system. We have this great system on the East Coast -- Acela. I use that frequently.

It all has to do with cost per passenger per mile. We have to recognize that folks are not going to run a train from Florida to California -- folks are not going to do that. And we're subsidizing that. We need to redirect the money to more popular routes.

And if you want to do this, you have to stop this pork barrel spending. Who hasn't hard about the bridge to nowhere in Alaska? It's outrageous.

I'm not ashamed to tell you that there's certain high growth areas that are badly in need. We gotta be fair to the American people.

9 Q) Do you have plans to regulate the actual fees for services in your health plan?

MCCAIN: I think it has to be better policed and regulated -- more in keeping with the actual costs. But that's not the root of the problem -- Americans are not as responsible for their health care as they ought to be.

FOLLOW UP: More specifics?

MCCAIN: If that money was coming out of your pocket, you'd be more careful about how you spent it.

10 Q) What about the Asian-American vote? We pay taxes too. I feel like Asian-Americans have been left out of the political process. You and others -- never mentioned 'Asian American.' We feel that we are being left out. Are you going to reach out to Asian-American communities?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: Yes. Could I say that there are Asian-American members of Congress and others who have contributed much to our country. If I have gave the impression that I've neglected the contributions of your community, my apologies.

FOLLOW-UP: Lots of Asian-Americans -- but no mention. Will you mention us from now on?

MCCAIN: I got your message loud and clear. You listen to me in the future.

11 Q) How are we going to charge all these electric cars? Think about it. Reform that.

MCCAIN: Everyone remembers the rolling black-outs with large discomfort. Right now, we have not built a nuclear power plant in more than 30 years. It takes 5 years to build a nuclear power plant. I want to assure you that nuclear power has got to be a part of any plan to solve our energy needs.

The French -- 80% of their electricity comes from nuclear energy. We need to store and re-process like them.

FOLLOW-UP: Nuclear power is not the way to go. We know that the half-life of this radioactive material is a million years -- and we haven't figured out a way to dispose of that. We need to rely on changing our lifestyle and conservation.

MCCAIN: I agree with that -- but I am not going to tell Americans that they have to shiver in the dark.

12 Q) What lessons besides securing the borders have you learned? And 2, governor of Alaska for VP?

MCCAIN: We are still in the process of the VP search. Excuse me what was your first question?

QUESTIONER: Inaudible

MCCAIN: There is the need for temporary workers. The lesson I learned was that Americans demand and want the borders secure first. And we have the technology to do that. And we need to have a temporary worker program that works. Immigration is a national security issue and one of great importance.

13 Q) I would like you to pursue solar energy and not nuclear because it is hazardous. Solar is cheap and very safe.

MCCAIN: I will pursue solar to it's fullest degree. Some straight talk -- solar alone will not solve all of our energy needs. It has to be part of a multi-tiered solution.

14 Q) Many of us have long commutes. The valley is so filled with commuters without mass transit. My gas prices have sky-rocketed. There's an immediate need -- and I don't see an answer to that. Do you?

MCCAIN: I don't, but I'd like to get you some relief -- and that was my gas-tax holiday. All I wanted to do was give you a little relief for the summer. But I would also like to make sure that we don't raise your taxes. I don't see an immediate relief -- but I do see an exploitation of our reserves.

Who pays the most on a per capita basis for gasoline? It's of people of low income and fixed income with older cars. And I liked to get them some relief.

15 Q) What is your stance on the Palestinian-Israel conflict? What are your thoughts on bringing back the middle class?

MCCAIN: So many, millions of Americans are finding that they signed documents they didn't understand and aren't able to make those payments anymore. I'd like people to be able to go and get a 30-year FHA guaranteed loan. So that's an immediate help, to keep Americans in their homes. I don't want to raise taxes -- I'm not gonna raise taxes on them. I believe that it's very important that we restore trust in government. I will always put my country first. These are tough times. I want to assure you that I will do everything in my power to restore the American dream. What I should know is that you and your family is hurting right now, I'll reach across the aisle and get problems solved for you.

16 Q) Veteran. Served with McCain.

MCCAIN: Thank you for your service.

Could all our vets raise their hands? Thank you and God bless.

17 Q) I'm a veteran. The forgotten war of Korea. What I want to hear from you and your administration sir when you become president, are you going to improve the conditions for the veterans that return with injuries?

MCCAIN: Yes sir, it's part of my plan. The Korean war may be the forgotten war, but those who fought in it will never be forgotten. Thank you for your service.

My friends, what happened at Walter-Reed can never happen again. There are numerous cases of PTSD and its terrible. We have to change our system so we are able to get care more quickly to our vets. We have to expand the capability of the VA. I want to take every veteran that needs a routine health care need, give them a plastic card so they are able to get health care anywhere.

Conclusion

I hope you will ask Senator Obama to join me in a town hall meeting here in California.

My friends, one thing I promise you, you can always count on, I will put my country first.

A Mixed Take by McCain Camp on Obama's Trip to War Zones (NYT 7/18/08)
By LARRY ROHTER
For months, Senator John McCain and other Republicans have been criticizing Senator Barack Obama for not having visited Iraq in a long time, even running a daily tally that is now well past 900 days. But now that Mr. Obama is about to travel there and elsewhere in the region, Republicans seem unable to decide whether that is worthy of praise or an opportunity for payback for Mr. Obama's unrelenting criticism of their own policy.

McCain In 2003: We Can 'Muddle Through In Afghanistan' (ThinkProgress 7/17/08)
By Jon Soltz
Today, video was unearthed in which Senator John McCain in 2003 says we can just "muddle through in Afghanistan." ...The video offers a glimpse into the true thinking of those, like McCain, who backed launching the war in Iraq and committing our forces there indefinitely. Particularly, they believed that Afghanistan wasn't a concern and we didn't need to take it seriously. In fact, just a year earlier, on CBS' Face the Nation, McCain said capturing Osama bin Laden wasn't "that important."

McCain: Obama Is An Extremist, "I Don't Know" If He's A Socialist (TPM 7/17/08)

Going jaw to jaw with our enemies (Boston Globe 7/18/08)
By Ted Sorensen
SENATOR JOHN McCain has apparently decided to focus not on the sagging economy under the disastrous Bush economic and fiscal policies, which McCain would continue, but on Senator Barack Obama's willingness to communicate with hostile foreign leaders, such as those in Iran, North Korea, and Syria.

Telling moments, or trivial pursuits? (USA Today 7/18/08)
Eight seconds of dead air is an eternity on TV, so when Republican presidential candidate John McCain struggled that long to answer a reporter who had just asked whether it's fair that some health insurance plans cover Viagra for men but not birth control medication for women, it drew plenty of attention. It even spawned an attack ad from Planned Parenthood.

Would McCain's health proposal get the job done? (Chicago Tribune 7/17/08)

Will the next president lead the way to affordable, high quality health care for all Americans? If John McCain gets the job, the answer is "no" and Republicans should be outraged that their candidate has not developed a more creative solution true to conservative ideals.

One thing I think we need to push, that was effective in our groups, is to remind people of the wonderful things that the Clinton Foundation has done around the globe. In the midst of all this incoming stuff, can we remind the world what has been accomplished? In addition to confronting the accusations, do we also have an opportunity to insert the message below that was an effective response in our vulnerability research:

Hillary Clinton's opponents are trying to start a controversy where none exists. The Clinton Foundation is a totally non-political charity whose work saves and improves lives at home and around the world. Because of charitable contributions to the Foundation and its programs, 8 million people have benefited from lifesaving HIV/AIDS medications, 6,000 American schools are providing kids with healthy food choices in an effort to fight childhood obesity; 28,000 African farmers have improved their crops; and 248 million tons of greenhouse gas emissions are being reduced in cities worldwide. The Clinton Global Initiative brings together people from business, labor, government, and the non-profit world to solve problems without politics or gridlock. Republican opponents want to confuse voters about the Clinton Foundation and its donors because all this good work is proof that what Hillary cares about most is helping hard-working people and families build better lives.

The Council, which currently has local presence in the NYC, Philadelphia, and San Francisco areas, holds monthly meetings for its membership that feature expert presenters from the pages of Inc. magazine, and facilitates peer-to-peer development to support business growth and wealth-creation amongst business owners. Current discussions between Inc. and CEO are focused around the feasibility of creating an enhanced EMP program that would provide high-growth entrepreneurs from underserved populations with a Mentor from the Council membership, as well as access to key Council privileges including workshops with guest speakers, special events, and access to exclusive networking opportunities.

MAJOR INTERNATIONAL INITIATIVES

Clinton Development Initiative

Malawi

While in Malawi, Walker Morris escorted Jens Johannson from U&We, largest seller of Plan Vivo in Sweden, to meet with Trees of Hope project farmers, local program monitors and CDI Lead Farmers.

CDI is finalizing the steps needed to be ready to distribute initial carbon credit sale funds to smallholder farmers in Trees of Hope. CDI is working with the local bank FMB to set up accounts for each of the farmers receiving funds. FMB has offices in the rural areas CDI serves and also provides banking services at local locations of two farm supply stores, so that project farmers will have readily available access to deposit and withdraw funds.

Rains came late this year but have generally been good. The Santhe area, where CDI operates three commercial farms, had a two week spell of no rains in late December/early January which was causing concern, but they recently experienced good rains.

Rwanda

The Mt. Meru Soyco factory is still progressing according to the timeframe. Two forty-foot containers with additional construction materials have reached the site. The CEO for the project is expected to be back on the site early this week.

Regarding the AGRA project, all crops are maturing on the field. By the end of the month, the CHDI team hopes to do field days, which involve mobilizing a large number of farmers to demonstrate to them where some technologies have been successful.

Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative

Colombia

The Acceso Fund Investment Committee approved a $500,000 investment in the Acceso Training Center in Cartagena which will train 20,000 Cartagena residents over the next 10 years. The Training Center will be located in the Manga area of Cartagena and is expected to open next month.

THINGS IN THE PENALTY BOX

UNIVERSITY OF MISSOURI

THE STORY

Yesterday, a job opened up at the University of Missouri.

WHAT HAPPENED?

The school's president stepped down. And the chancellor got demoted. That's because over the past few months, racial tension on campus has been high. Think: racial slurs and a swastika symbol being smeared in poop in a dorm. Recently, students have been calling on the president to resign, saying he didn't do enough to handle the incidents. Last week, a student went on a hunger strike in protest. But the tipping point happened over the weekend, when dozens of football players said they would boycott the sport until the president resigned. It worked. Yesterday, the president said he takes "full responsibility for the inaction," and the chancellor will "transition" into another job.

theSKIMM

A lot of people are thinking it's no coincidence that the resignation comes just after the football team's boycott. Forfeiting this weekend's game could have cost the school $1 million . Translation: money talks.

RUSSIA

Yesterday, Russia was accused of being really, really good at cheating .

WHAT HAPPENED?

An international anti-doping commission reported that there's a "deeply rooted culture of cheating" in Russian sports. Examples? A lot of its athletes — especially in track and field — are allegedly doping, and officials were reportedly bribed and intimidated to look the other way. Meanwhile, the government has been accused of destroying drug test samples before an inspection. The report says the cheating is so bad that Russian athletes should sit out track and field competitions at next year's Olympics in Brazil.

theSKIMM

A lot of people are getting bad deja vu, saying this reminds them of Soviet times when cheating among athletes was a big problem. But Russian officials are saying 'nyet true.' They have until the end of the week to respond to the allegations.

Hell yeah! Tonight is GOP fight night on Fox Business at 9pm ET. Fox has wasted zero time reminding everyone just how badly its rival network CNBC was thought to have screwed up the last debate. Fox promises a "real debate" this time. Nice. Meanwhile, frontrunner Ben Carson has some explaining to do. He's been re-memorizing his resume ever since it came out last week that he never got a scholarship to West Point ...although Carson said he did in his memoir. Details, details. Who won't be there? Gov. Chris Christie (R-NJ) and former Gov. Mike Huckabee (R-AK), who didn't poll high enough to make the cut. They'll be at the kids table debate. PS – drink when you hear these terms .

WHAT TO SAY TO YOUR FRIEND WHO KEEPS GETTING SPEEDING TICKETS IN THE MAIL...

It could be worse. Yesterday, Rolling Stone got hit with yet another lawsuit in a string of lawsuits related to last year's campus rape article. Refresher: last November, everybody read the magazine's story detailing an alleged gang rape at the University of Virginia's Phi Kappa Psi fraternity. Rolling Stone later retracted the story. Earlier this year, a UVA associate dean named in the article sued the magazine, saying it made her out to be the "chief villain." Then, three fraternity members sued the magazine. Now, the UVA chapter of Phi Kappa Psi is suing Rolling Stone for $25 million, saying the story did major damage to its members' reputations.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOU GET DEJA VU...

Myanmar can relate. Earlier this week, the country had what's being called its freest election in decades . The results are still coming in, but it's looking like the pro-democracy party led by Aung San Suu Kyi is headed for a big W. Her party won the last time the country had free elections in the 90s. But it turned out the military – which had been in power for a long, long time – wasn't quite ready to give up control just yet. Cue Suu Kyi spending a lot of time under house arrest. And becoming a Nobel Peace laureate and pro-democracy symbol around the world. Fast forward to today, and it looks like the country still wants her party in charge. Now, everybody's holding their breath to see if the military is finally ready to sing a few rounds of "Let It Go," and step outta the way.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN THAT GUY YOU'VE BEEN SEEING TAKES HOURS TO TEXT YOU BACK...

Now I know how Spain feels. Yesterday, lawmakers in Catalonia – hint: the part of Spain that includes Barcelona – OK'd a plan for eventual independence from the motherland. For years, a lot of Catalans have been feeling like they're ready to break free. Spain thinks this is no bueno. It's not thrilled about the idea of Catalonia — which makes up a huge part of Spain's GDP — flying solo, especially while the country is still recovering from a recession. But Catalonia – which has its own language and traditions – isn't a fan of paying taxes to Spain while being treated like the newbie matador at the bullfight. Yesterday's move puts them on the road to a referendum vote, maybe by 2017.

Dear Trustees,

It has been an astonishingly busy start of the year, with a number of last-minute matters vying for our scarce time. In the midst of it, though, we will take a moment to congratulate three faculty at this afternoon's faculty meeting. As you may recall, both the Timme and Buckhardt Chairs were vacated by recent retirements, so we have made two new appointments to these chairs. In addition, the Malley tenure decision was announced today.

Best,

Teresa

Subject: Faculty appointment announcements
To: facstaff dist <facstaff_dist@knox.edu >

Dear Knox Community,

It gives me great pleasure to announce that two of our colleagues have been appointed to endowed professorships in recognition of their distinguished teaching, scholarship, and service to Knox College and that a third colleague has been promoted to associate professor with tenure. I have made these appointments upon the recommendation of the Faculty Personnel Committee and the Dean of the College and, in the case of the tenure and promotion, the approval of the Board of Trustees.

Steve Cohn has been appointed the Charles W. and Arvilla S. Timme Chair in Economics. Professor Cohn earned his Ph.D. from the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, M.P.A. from the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs from Princeton University, and B.A. from Amherst College. His scholarship includes Reintroducing Macroeconomics: A Critical Approach (2006) and Too Cheap to Meter: An Economic and Philosophic Analysis of the Nuclear Dream (1997); his current work is on the evolution of Chinese economic theory from 1949 to the present. He has published and presented professional work, domestically and internationally, on critiques of neoclassical economic thought, environmental economics, and the contemporary Chinese economy and Chinese political-economic theory. Cohn has taught at Knox since 1984, and recently returned from teaching at the Chinese Studies Institute at Peking University. He also has chaired the Department of Economics and served as consultant and director of the Micro and Macro Critique Workshops for the Global Development and Environment Institute. The Timme Chair has had a very distinguished history at Knox: the previous holder was Roy Andersen, who retired last June, and, prior to that, Wilbur Pillsbury.

Charles W. Timme, a retired financial officer and analyst with the U.S. Air Force and the U.S. Agency for International Development, neither attended nor worked at Knox. His only connection to the College was his cousin, Judge Robert Castendyck, a member of the Class of 1944. Yet this relationship led him and his wife, Arvilla, to bequeath their estate to Knox College in 1993, resulting in the largest individual gift in Knox's history at that time. The Timme gift created two endowed funds – the faculty chair in economics and a fund to support student projects and research in economics facilitated through the Vovis Center for Research & Advanced Study.

Jessie L. Dixon will hold the Burkhardt Distinguished Chair in Modern Languages. Professor Dixon received her Ph.D. and M.A. in Romance Languages and Literatures from the University of Chicago, and her B.A. from Knox College. Her scholarship includes publications and presentations on Cuban underground hip-hop, Caribbean literature, Afro-Hispanic literature, and the teaching of elementary and intermediate Spanish. Dixon has taught at Knox since 1994, and in 2004, she was awarded the Phillip Green Wright Lombard College Distinguished Teaching Award for Tenured Faculty. Dixon currently serves as chair of the Department of Modern Languages and has served as director of the Knox programs in Barcelona, Besancon, and Buenos Aires, as well as short-term programs in Puerto Rico, Dominican Republic, and Ghana and Benin. Dixon is also co-chair of Knox's summer program, College for Kids.

The Burkhardt Distinguished Chair in Modern Languages was established in 2009 through the generosity of Dr. Richard W. Burkhardt '39 and Dorothy Johnson Burkhardt '39. Both Burkhardts had long and distinguished careers in the academy. Dr. Burkhardt served on the faculties of Syracuse and Ball State Universities; he served as vice president and dean of the faculty at Ball State, a position he held for almost 20 years, until he retired in 1985. During the 1978-1979 academic year, Dr. Burkhardt also served as acting president of the university. Mrs. Burkhardt served as instructor of French, Spanish and Russian, also at Ball State, from 1958 to 1983, and was awarded the Palmes Academiques by the French government for her efforts to promote cross-cultural learning between France and the United States. She was a member of the Board of Trustees at Knox from 1976 to 1990, when she was elected a life trustee. In 2010, the Burkhardts provided funding to enhance the language teaching lab in George Davis Hall which today carries their name. Sadly, we lost both dear friends of Knox last year, but I know they would have been delighted at this appointment.

Nikki Malley, Music, has been promoted to the rank of Associate Professor with tenure. Nikki received her Ph.D. from the University of Iowa in Musicology and B.A. in Music from Knox College. Her areas of teaching expertise include Jazz History and Performance, and Music of the African Diaspora, and her scholarly work is focused on the "music" of auctioneering. Prof. Malley serves as the Director of the Knox Jazz Ensemble, Artistic Director of the Knox Rootabaga Jazz Festival; she has directed the Knox Jazz Ensemble and Knox Cherry Street Combo, plays in the Knox-Galesburg Symphony and Galesburg Community Chorus, and has been a featured soloist in many performances. In 2013, Nikki secured a grant from the Jerome Mirza Foundation to establish a jazz residency on campus.

Please join me in congratulating these three colleagues on these richly deserved recognitions.

Huma ,,,,Laura forwarded your enquiry to me.

It was an interview on Israeli TV in Hebrew,,,,,on the day she announced,,,,,,someone took my statement and translated it freely to English,and stated what THEY wanted to state NOT what I said.

Never said that she opposes the deal,,,said" I don't know and if I knew I couldn't say".....they took out the part that said "I don't know",,,kept the rest and then concluded that it's a hint that she opposes,,,,,baloney stuff.,,,,,

All questions that I am asked about policy I simply answer "I don't know",,,,,and I just praise her experience courage persistence tenacity etc,,,,no policy discussions.

The Hill needs to go the Hebrew lessons if they want to quote Hebrew interviews.

Saban hints: Clinton opposes the Iran deal

Just minutes before Hillary Clinton announced her candidacy for the 2016 presidential election, Israeli Channel One News interviewed Haim Saban, an American-Israeli media magnate and long-time Clinton supporter. Noticeably excited, he explained that she had waited to make the announcement until she had carefully prepared the ground for her campaign.

Then came the big question: What is her position on the Iran deal?

ADVERTISEMENT

Saban responded carefully, “She will have to, at some stage, express her opinion. But we know that in essence and in every important matter, she is committed to the security of Israel. She is a friend of the State of Israel. And we've seen this over the past 25 to 30 years. So, there won't be any problems with relations between the United States and Israel when Hillary Clinton is president. No problem. On the contrary.”

But Ya’akov Ayalon, the host of the nightly Channel One news pressed on: And where does Hillary Clinton stand on this issue?

"I know where she stands but I can't talk about it," Saban admitted.

"Give me a hint," Ayalon had to ask.

"I hinted to you – that I know," Saban couldn’t repress a laugh. "But I can't reveal to you things that were said behind closed doors. She has an opinion, a very well-defined opinion. And in any case, everything that she thinks and everything she has done and will do will always be for the good of Israel. We don't need to worry about this.”

The implication: Clinton is against the Iran deal.

Why? Because Israelis – across the political spectrum – are against the deal, and Saban knows this. From the extreme left of Zionist parties and partisans to the extreme right, Israelis oppose the deal. For Haaretz reporter Ari Shavit , it’s President Obama’s big mistake. Former Prime Minister and head of the Labor Party Ehud Barak came right out and urged the United States to tell Iran to “dismantle or else .” Barak said, "The Pentagon and the forces of America under the backing and probable directive of the [US] president [could] create an extremely effective means to destroy the Iranian nuclear military program over a fraction of one night.” And as the former IDF Chief of General Staff and Israeli Minister of Defense, Barak might know a thing or two about this topic.

Barak is not alone. Israelis, across the political spectrum, want the military option on the table – on the negotiating table, where it belongs. The debate in Israel is not whether the deal is good. It’s whether Prime Minister Netanyahu is responsible for the bad deal – by spoiling Israel’s relations with the United States, or whether Obama is responsible for the bad deal by virtue of his unrealistic idealism and tendency to over-compromise.

So when Yaakov Ayalon says, “Give me a hint” and Haim Saban says “I hinted to you – that I know,” and just after he’s said “there won’t be any problems with relations between the United States and Israel when Hillary Clinton is president,” that means he is convinced that Hillary Clinton is against the Iran deal.

And this is big news. Israelis have been anxiously waiting for Hillary Clinton to openly state her position on the Iran deal. Congress is the last bastion of hope for Israel. Well before the P5+1 negotiations in Lausanne, Israeli news analysts focused intently on the Corker-Menendez bill. If Hillary Clinton comes out against the deal, more Democrats will join Republicans in demanding that Iran abandon its nuclear ambitions. And this is what Israelis, across the political spectrum, are praying for.

ON THE WHITE HOUSE

Clinton Decision Holding Up Other Obama Choices

Just under a week after news broke that President-elect Barack Obama met with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton to discuss naming her the Secretary of State, Mr. Obama's aides announced that the job of White House counsel was going to Gregory B. Craig, Mr. Obama's longtime foreign policy adviser.

Now, wasn't Mr. Craig supposed to be getting one of the foreign policy jobs, like deputy secretary of state or national security adviser? After all, he's been meeting with officials in the various embassies in Washington for months, getting advice on how a President Obama might handle everything from Iran's nuclear ambitions to Middle East peace negotiations to the worsening situation on the Afghanistan-Pakistan border.

The official word out of the Obama camp was that Mr. Craig, who represented Bill Clinton during the House impeachment trial, was always viewed as a natural for White House counsel, a job that would take advantage of his years as a Washington powerhouse lawyer.

But several Obama advisers acknowledged privately that Mr. Craig couldn't take a foreign policy job if Mrs. Clinton ended up at State — too much animosity and bad history there.

In fact, all of the foreign policy jobs in the administration have been held up because of the uncertainty over the appointment of Mrs. Clinton. Once that's cleared up, Democratic aides said, the rest of the national security team will follow.

Meanwhile Mr. Craig, a close and trusted Obama adviser on foreign policy during the campaign, exited the sausage-making apparatus, and has ended up in what many believe is a much better place. As White House counsel he can roam the world of both foreign and domestic policy, engaging in everything from handling Guantanamo and torture to digging up skeletons from the Bush administration. "Everyone thinks it's a consolation prize," a senior Democratic adviser said. "In the protocol list it outranks national security adviser."

Speaking of which: If Mrs. Clinton does not end up at State, then Jim Steinberg, the former deputy national security adviser in the Clinton administration, is at the top of the list for the national security adviser job. Mr. Steinberg could even get the job if Mrs. Clinton takes Secretary of State, Democratic aides say, although some consideration might be given to whether Mr. Steinberg has the heft to keep Mrs. Clinton's outsized personality in check.

Susan Rice, one of the earliest foreign policy advisers to sign on with Mr. Obama, also gets a new lease on life if Mrs. Clinton is out of the running for Secretary of State. Like Mr. Craig, Ms. Rice worked for the Clinton administration, handling Africa policy during the 1990s.

But the two of them formed a tag team to debunk Mrs. Clinton's claim to foreign policy experience during the campaign.

When 11,000 pages of Mrs. Clinton's public schedule as first lady were released back in March, Mr. Craig said they showed that Mrs. Clinton was out of the loop when critical foreign policy decisions were made and that her trips abroad were largely ceremonial.

"The fact is, and this was established by the White House schedules, that she did not attend NSC meetings or routinely meet with the Secretary of State or the National Security Adviser," said Mr. Craig, who was also a senior State Department official during the Clinton administration. "She did not routinely get briefed by the intelligence community, and there is no evidence that she participated or asserted herself in any of the crises that took place during the eight years of the Clinton presidency."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ms. Rice, for her part, questioned the link between being First Lady and acquiring foreign policy knowledge. No question, it would be tough to put those three together at the helm of any Obama foreign policy team.

Ms. Rice could get the post of United States ambassador to the United Nations , a cabinet-level position under President Clinton. President Bush downgraded the position when he came into office, but many expect that Mr. Obama could upgrade the job back to its old level, particularly if he appoints Ms. Rice.

Of course, if Mrs. Clinton doesn't get the Secretary of State job, Democratic advisers say a whole host of opportunities open back up for all of the Obama foreign policy types who got on her bad side during the primaries.

Times-Picayune: "Hillary Clinton hosting New York fundraiser for Mary Landrieu"

By Bruce Alpert

November 25, 2014, 5:55 p.m. EST

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton is hosting a New York City fundraiser for Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., on Monday.

Landrieu, trailing in recent polls to Republican Rep. Bill Cassidy for the Dec. 6 runoff, continues to face an avalanche of negative ads from conservative advocacy groups, such as Karl Rove's American Crossroads. But the National Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee, apparently confident of Cassidy's victory, has canceled planned TV ads in New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Lafayette, according to Politico.

Clinton, who campaigned at a New Orleans rally for Landrieu before just before the Nov. 4 primary, is hosting the Landrieu fundraiser at the home of long-time Clinton supporters Sarah and Victory Kovner. Tickets range from $1,000 to $12,600, with proceeds going to Landrieu's Senate campaign, the Louisiana Democratic Party and Landrieu's political action committee. Clinton, the former First Lady and New York senator, is the current frontrunner for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination.

Meanwhile, outside groups reported new allocations Tuesday to fund efforts aimed at defeating Landrieu.

Ending Spending Inc. reported in a filing Tuesday with the Federal Election Commission reported that it spent $187,000 for "direct contact" with Louisiana voters in opposition to Landrieu. The group was created by Joe Ricketts, founder of TD Ameritrade. Tea Party Patriots reported a $7,000 allocation for e-marketing efforts against Landrieu and $2,031 for automated calls and script writing on behalf of Cassidy.

Vote 2 Reduce Debt, another conservative group, is spending $1,600 on internet ads and phone banks in support of Cassidy, according to an FEC filing Tuesday.

Associated Press: "Hillary Clinton Treads Lightly On Policy Issues As She Eyes 2016"

By Ken Thomas

November 26, 2014, 9:33 a.m. EST

Hillary Rodham Clinton offered praise for President Barack Obama's executive actions to stave off deportation for millions of immigrants living in the U.S. illegally. But the Democrats' favored presidential hopeful has been less forthcoming on other issues in these early days of the 2016 contest.

Clinton is not, so far, a candidate, and she's limiting her commentary about the daily news cycle confronting Obama — a strategy that could keep down chatter about where she and the unpopular president agree and where they diverge.

The former secretary of state, senator and first lady is not talking about the Keystone XL pipeline, rejected by one vote in the final weeks of the Democrat-led Senate. She has yet to speak publicly about a sweeping climate change agreement between the U.S. and China, an extension of talks over Iran's nuclear program or the Senate's move to block a bill to end bulk collection of Americans' phone records by the National Security Agency.

When Obama announced his moves to prevent the deportations for nearly 5 million immigrants living in the U.S. illegally, Clinton quickly embraced the decision on Twitter. The president, she wrote, was "taking action on immigration in the face of inaction" in Congress. In doing so, she signaled that as a candidate, she would run against the Republican-led House and Senate that convenes next year. Clinton also drew a distinction from her would-be GOP opponents who have spoken of immigration reform in large part as a border security problem.

On other weighty policy matters, however, Clinton is mum.

"You've got to make choices if you're not a candidate," said Lanny Davis, a White House special counsel during the Clinton administration who attended law school with Bill and Hillary Clinton. "She is not a candidate for president. When she becomes a candidate, she has to start answering questions."

Nick Merrill, a Clinton spokesman, declined to comment.

Clinton is expected to make her political intentions known in the coming weeks, likely in early 2015. Her speeches are closely watched for signs of how she might offer a rationale for her candidacy.

Clinton campaigned for Democratic candidates during the fall, often pointing to pocketbook issues like equal pay for women, raising the minimum wage and expanded family leave policies. "A 20th century economy will not work for 21st century families," she said at an October rally.

Since then, Clinton has taken a more circumspect posture in public events, appearing at charity events and voicing support for issues related to her work at the Clinton Foundation. That approach allows her to stay above the political fray in the aftermath of Democrats' poor showing during the midterm elections.

Clinton has stayed close to Obama on immigration, releasing a statement that noted that previous presidents of both parties had taken similar steps.

The following night, in an interview at a New York Historical Society event, Clinton reiterated the need for Congress to act on a comprehensive immigration bill. She also put the issue in the context of families, saying the decision probably affected wait staff who were serving the dinner.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"There is probably no more pressing issue at this time than to fix this immigration system," said Alex Padilla, California's secretary of state-elect. "As a leader, it was right for her to speak up. A lot of people wanted to know what she thought."

Other policy issues carry more political risk.

Clinton has avoided weighing in on the Keystone XL pipeline, saying it wouldn't be appropriate for her since the environmental review by the State Department happened during her watch. The issue is tricky for Democrats because labor unions have supported the plan but environmentalists adamantly oppose it.

Clinton has called climate change the nation's "most consequential" issue but has yet to weigh in on the agreement Obama reached with China to set new targets for cutting emissions. The deal was negotiated by John Podesta, a Clinton White House chief of staff who is expected to play a prominent role in a Clinton presidential campaign.

Both issues could receive attention from Clinton on Monday, when she is scheduled to address the League of Conservation Voters in New York.

On NSA surveillance, Clinton has talked broadly about the need to balance the need for security without infringing upon Americans' privacy amid a debate over the government's collection of data. But she has kept a low profile on the issue.

Republicans contend Clinton is being overly political in the lead-up to a presidential campaign.

"Everything Hillary does is for political purposes," said Republican National Committee spokeswoman Kirsten Kukowski, "which includes taking positions for political expediency and not answering tough questions for political reasons."

CNN: "Is the Clinton magic gone in Arkansas?"

By Dan Merica

November 26, 2014, 9:34 a.m. EST

This state launched the Clinton brand two decades ago and handed Hillary Clinton one of the biggest victories of her 2008 primary battle against Barack Obama.

But as she considers another bid for the White House in 2016, Arkansas isn't so friendly.

In the final weeks of the 2014 election, top Democrats in Arkansas told Hillary Clinton and her associates that she wasn't welcome to stump for the party's candidates in the state, according to a knowledgeable source. While there were some in Arkansas who wanted her to come, the "stay away" contingent won the argument and Hillary Clinton was left to raise money for Sen. Mark Pryor from New York.

Bill Clinton made up for the absence, making 13 stops in the state during campaign season imploring voters to not make the election a repudiation of President Barack Obama.

Still, Democrats across Arkansas lost big. The governor's mansion flipped red, along with Pryor's Senate seat. The state's four-member House delegation is solidly Republican.

The rout was part of a broader repudiation of Democrats across the South this election cycle. But the results in Arkansas were particularly tough for the Clintons and raise questions about whether the state most associated with the couple is no longer welcome territory ahead of Hillary Clinton's potential 2016 race.

"The coattails were short," outgoing Democratic Gov. Mike Beebe told CNN. "It is a fact."

Changes in Arkansas

Bill Clinton handily won Arkansas during both of his presidential elections. But the politics of the South changed during his time in office as many states were increasingly dominated by Republicans.

Arkansas was a genuine battleground state during the 2000 election, when Al Gore and George W. Bush both campaigned here and spent money on television ads. Seeking to distance himself from Bill Clinton after his impeachment, Gore didn't campaign with the former President and lost Arkansas to Bush by 5 points.

By 2008, Arkansas was seen as so unfriendly to Democrats that Obama wrote the state off -- even as he won other southern states like North Carolina and Virginia that Republicans carried for decades.

Before the 2014 election, Hillary Clinton's supporters -- many at the grassroots level in Arkansas -- would quietly talk about the former first lady's chances of competing and winning Arkansas in 2016. They touted her standing with white women and working class voters.

But after Election Day, those optimistic Democrats are harder to find.

"Limited," said Vincent Insalaco, the chair of the Arkansas Democratic Party, when asked about Hillary Clinton's chances of winning the state. "It is limited here in Arkansas."

"I think she could run a strong race here, but I think the electorate has changed," said Clarke Tucker, a newly elected Democratic state representative. "The state has changed."

Hillary Clinton moved to Arkansas in 1974, joining her soon-to-be husband, Bill, who was already a rising political star in the state. The couple would go on to dominate the state's politics for the better part of two decades and left a long list of confidants -- known as FOBs or Friends of Bill -- in key Democratic positions across the state.

But times have changed. Republican power bases in northwest Arkansas have grown, religious conservatives are a powerful voting bloc and the state's Latino population has yet to become a force at the ballot box.

"Arkansas is a real demographic nightmare for Democrats," said Andrew Dowdle, the vice chair of political science at the University of Arkansas. "It is a complete reversal of fortunes."

All of this complicates the idea that Hillary Clinton could win Arkansas in 2016. During the 2008 primary, Hillary Clinton dominated Obama, winning 70% of the state, her largest victory during that year's primary fight. That was the only time she has been on the ballot in the state, however, and was a contest with just Democratic voters.

The 2014 exit polls in Arkansas weren't positive for Hillary Clinton, either. Thirty-nine percent of voters said she would make a good president, according to the exit polls. Fifty-six percent said she would not.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Those same exit polls found that former GOP Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, who is also considering a 2016 run, is seen as a better presidential option in the state than Hillary Clinton. Fifty percent of voters in Arkansas said he would be a good president, compared to 46% who said he wouldn't.

With the former first lady eyeing another run at the presidency in 2016, Democrats and Arkansas experts said that while she would easily win the Democratic primary, she would struggle mightily to overcome what has become a changed state.

Democrat's silver lining: Obama is gone in 2016

Democrats in Arkansas blame Obama -- not the Clintons -- for their losses.

One reason Beebe, the outgoing governor, sees things getting better for Democrats in 2016 and beyond is because "Obama will be gone."

"I think it is all Obama," Beebe said. "I don't think there is any question that most folks feel like it was a repudiation of the president and the president's policies. But I think it is cyclical and the reason I say that is if you look at the history."

"Democrats are looking at what can she do different from Barack Obama," said Dowdle. "If you are a Democratic party activist, you would end up hoping she would win white women. ... That idea that a woman candidate could end up running and making the gap grow is not going to happen."

Exit polls show that Beebe is partly right: Nearly 70% of voters in Arkansas said they disapprove of Obama. Only 30% said they were satisfied with him.

For Inalasco, 2016 -- and a Hillary Clinton run - is a moment to rebuild.

"I would hope that she would carry Arkansas," he said, rejecting the idea that Democrats are done in the state. "But if she runs it is so, so positive for us on the local level, here, for what we can do with her popularity."

As for whether the Clinton magic is gone in Arkansas, Inalasco deferred his answer for two years.

"I guess," he said, "we will see what happens in 2016, won't we?"

Washington Post blog: "Clinton has a clear lead among Democrats — but would face stiff competition from Romney, Christie"

By Jose DelReal

November 26, 2014, 8:26 a.m. EST

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton continues to lead the 2016 Democratic presidential field — it's not even close — but another Clinton administration is far from a sure thing, even if the election were held today: A new poll out Wednesday shows that even as the clear Democratic favorite, she would face stiff competition from several would-be GOP candidates.

The new Quinnipiac survey has Clinton with support from a whopping 57 percent of Democrats, followed at a distant second by Massachusetts

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sen. Elizabeth Warren, at 13 percent. Vice President Joe Biden trails with 9 percent, while no other candidate breaks the 4 percent threshold.

Clinton has yet to announce whether she will run but is widely expected to enter the race. The vice president has publicly flirted with the idea of running, while Warren has so far dismissed the possibility of a 2016 candidacy.

The field is far less clear on the GOP side, where former presidential candidate Mitt Romney remains the favorite with 19 percent support. The 2012 Republican presidential nominee has publicly said that he is not interested in mounting a third presidential bid. The poll has former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush following Romney among GOP voters with 11 percent support.

When Romney is taken out of the equation, Bush leads with 14 percent support, is followed by New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie at 11 percent. Both Bush and Christie have said publicly that they are considering throwing their hats in the ring, but have not formally entered the race.

Despite Clinton's enormous lead among potential rivals in the Democratic primary, the survey indicates she would struggle against several GOP candidates. Romney has 45 percent to Clinton's 44 percent, if the election were held today. And Clinton would have 43 percent to Christie's 42 percent.

She is a clearer favorite when matched against other GOP candidates, with a 46 percent to 41 percent edge over Bush, and a 46 percent to 42 percent advantage over Wisconsin Rep. Paul Ryan. And Clinton trounces Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, 48 percent to 37 percent.

The telephone survey of 1,623 registered voters was conducted by cell phone and landline between Nov. 18 and Nov. 23. The survey has a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

New York Times opinion: "Who Will Save the Democratic Party From Itself?"

By Thomas B. Edsall

November 25, 2014

Not everyone agrees that Hillary Clinton's selection as the Democratic nominee is unstoppable. The first to challenge her is Jim Webb, a one-term former senator from Virginia.

Here is the case for the Democratic Party renegade.

When Webb, who served as secretary of the Navy under Ronald Reagan, announced the formation of a presidential exploratory committee on Nov. 19, he sought to capitalize on Democratic discontent. Taking a swipe at both Wall Street and Clinton's potential bid for the nomination, Webb declared:

"Our Constitution established a government not to protect the dominance of an aristocratic elite, but under the principle that there should be no permanent aristocracy, that every single American should have equal protection under the law, and a fair opportunity to achieve at the very highest levels."

Webb suggested that he could bring working class whites back into the Democratic fold and restore the biracial Democratic coalition:

"We have drifted to the fringes of allowing the very inequalities that our Constitution was supposed to prevent. Walk into some of our inner cities if you dare, and see the stagnation, poverty, crime and lack of opportunity that still affects so many African-Americans. Or travel to the Appalachian Mountains, where my own ancestors settled and whose cultural values I still share, and view the poorest counties in America – who happen to be more than 90 percent white, and who live in the reality that "if you're poor and white you're out of sight.""

The Democratic Party used to be the place where people like these could come not for a handout but for an honest handshake, good full-time jobs, quality education, health care they can afford, and the vital, overriding belief that we're all in this together and the system is not rigged.

Webb's exploration of a presidential bid is based on the premise that he can tap into a crucial but alienated segment of the electorate.

This bloc includes voters convinced that Wall Street owns both parties, voters tired of politicians submitting to partisan orthodoxy and voters seeking to replace "identity group" politics with a restored middle- and working-class agenda.

Webb's election history – his victory in Virginia is the only race that he has run – suggests that he will have difficulty achieving his goals. Before we turn to examine the forces that will make his candidacy a difficult one, let's take a look at some positives.

Webb is a decorated veteran – he served from 1968 to 1972 in the Marine Corps in Vietnam, and was awarded the Navy Cross – as well as a pointed critic of military intervention in Iraq, Libya and Syria. Opposition to the war in Iraq was a centerpiece of his 2006 Senate campaign.

Webb is a prolific author of both novels and nonfiction. His books are dominated by themes of war and fighting from "Fields of Fire" to "Born Fighting" to "A Time to Fight." Webb notes with pride on his website his heritage as the descendant of "between 250,000 and 400,000 Scots-Irish" who migrated to America in the eighteenth century, traveling in groups of families and bringing with them not only long experience as rebels and outcasts but also unparalleled skills as frontiersmen and guerrilla fighters. Their cultural identity reflected acute individualism, dislike of aristocracy and a military tradition, and, over time, the Scots-Irish defined the attitudes and values of the military, of working class America, and even of the peculiarly populist form of American democracy itself.

Webb is one answer to the weaknesses of today's center-left, the so-called "upstairs-downstairs" coalition described by Joel Kotkin, presidential fellow in Urban Futures at Chapman University. Kotkin argues in his recently published book, "The New Class Conflict," that the Democratic Party has been taken over by what he calls "gentry liberals," an elite that has undermined the historic purpose of the Democratic Party.

Kotkin contends that "The great raison d'être for left-wing politics – advocating for the middle- and working classes – has been refocused to attend more closely to the policy imperatives and interests of small, highly affluent classes, as well as the powerful public sector."

I asked Kotkin what he thought of the themes Webb intends to raise, and he wrote back "I think he's onto something."

The Democrats, Kotkin believes, need "someone — Sherrod Brown, Webb, Jon Tester, somebody! — who speaks to the issues of upward mobility and incomes." Both Senator Brown and Senator Tester have staked out populist positions in support of their working-class constituents in Ohio and Montana.

Most Democratic politicians and strategists, according to Kotkin, "just have no feel at all — as Harry Truman and Bill Clinton did, for example — for the aspirations of the middle class. This is why they are losing them, and deservedly so."

Morris Fiorina, a political scientist at Stanford, is similarly critical of the "upscale capture" of the Democratic Party. In an email, he wrote that in the aftermath of the financial collapse of 2008, "the country is desperate for economic relief, but as time goes on it becomes clear that the administration's economic policy is to take care of the financial sector, where hundreds of people are clearly guilty of fraud in any layman's view. The result is building disappointment, resentment, and rage in the public, which results in the 2010 debacle."

"Today," Fiorina writes, "We have a situation where voters can choose between a party that openly admits to being a lap dog of Wall Street and a party that by its actions clearly is a lap dog but denies it. At least vote for the honest one."

Asked about Webb, Fiorina replied, "the emotional side of me loves him." But, Fiorina cautioned, "the rational side is worried about how he would actually behave if he were president."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Further to the left side of the political spectrum, Krystal Marie Ball, co-host of the MSNBC show The Cycle, waxed poetic on the air about the former Virginia senator on Nov. 22, telling viewers that Webb was “such a contrast from Hillary Clinton.”

"Clinton," Ball said, “is polished and produced and perfectly calibrated. He is not. He is rough. He is authentic. He cares about issues. He speaks plainly. He doesn’t try to oversmile, for example, he just is exactly who he is. And there’s something very compelling about that, and it is a stark contrast from the very carefully packaged and branded Clinton image.”

Al Hunt, a Bloomberg columnist, warned that Webb “could be Hillary Clinton’s worst nightmare,” noting that Webb seems an improbable candidate. He has taken illiberal positions, was President Ronald Reagan’s Navy secretary, has few relationships within the Democratic Party, and has no serious fund-raising network. What he does possess is a long-held and forceful opposition to U.S. interventions in Iraq and Libya, and potentially Syria, as well as solid anti-Wall Street credentials. In Democratic primaries, these may be Clinton’s greatest impediments to rallying a hard-core activist base.

To gauge Webb’s prospects, I looked at the exit poll data for the 2006 Virginia Senate race, when he unseated George Allen, the favored Republican. I then compared Webb’s performance among key constituencies to the performance of all House Democrats running nationwide in the same year.

The results of this comparison do not support the portrayal of Webb as a candidate equipped to win over key white constituencies.

Take, for example, the ballots cast by white men. Webb lost among these voters by a 24-point margin, 38-62. Exit poll data on all House races in 2006 shows that Democratic House candidates lost white men by a smaller 9-point margin, 44-53. White women voted for Allen over Webb by 53-47; while House Democratic candidates split the votes of white women, 49-50.

Similarly, self-identified conservatives chose Allen over Webb by a 76-point margin, 12-88, while House Democratic candidates lost this segment of the electorate by a substantial but smaller margin, 58 points (20-78). Webb did not do any better with white evangelical and born-again Protestants, losing these voters by a larger margin than did House Democratic candidates.

To further check the validity of these comparisons, I looked at 2006 exit polls in two other close Democratic Senate contests, in Montana, where Tester beat Conrad Burns by less than 3,000 votes, 198,302 to 195,455, and Claire McCaskill in Missouri, who beat the incumbent Republican Jim Talent, 50-47.

Tester and McCaskill both performed better among white men and women, conservatives and white born-again and evangelical Protestants, than Webb did.

Let’s forget Webb for a moment and take the question a step further. What are the prospects of winning the presidential nomination for a candidate who challenges current Democratic Party strategic orthodoxy? This strategy calls for identity group, rather than class-based, mobilization, on the assumption that turning out single women, the young, and racial and ethnic minorities is more effective than an uphill struggle to revive support in the recalcitrant white middle and working class.

As much as such a shift to a class-based strategy might result in economic policies more beneficial to less affluent Democratic constituencies, and therefore to more votes in the long haul, so far there has been insufficient intraparty pressure to force a change in strategic orientation.

It is not lost on Democratic strategists that President Obama won twice deploying a group-based rather than a class-based strategy. Even if the next Democratic nominee does not inspire the high minority turnout levels of 2008 and 2012, the 2016 electorate will be less Republican than it was in 2012. Every four years, the heavily Republican white share of voters drops by a little over 2 percent, and the disproportionately Democratic minority share grows by the same amount.

There are, however, fundamental problems with the current Democratic strategy, not least of which is that it is a strategy for winning presidential elections but not necessarily for exerting real political control.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The current approach depends on a Republican Party that refuses to adjust to the transforming composition of the electorate. The 2014 elections demonstrated, however, that the Republican Party and its candidates are not immune to feedback and will change if they have to in order to win.

Insofar as the Republican Party tempers its retrograde stance on social-sexual and moral-racial issues, Democratic campaigns stressing alleged threats from conservatives — the threat to freedom and privacy posed by the Christian right; the threat to Hispanic family unity posed by anti-immigrant activists; the threat to programs serving the poor posed by deficit hawks — will run out of gas.

That moment may be closer than expected. An Oct. 15 Washington Post/ABC poll found that the public held the Democratic Party "in worse regard than at any point in the past 30 years." An Oct. 24 Pew Research Center survey found, in turn, that the public favored Republicans over Democrats on such key issues as handling the economy, the budget deficit, immigration and terrorism.

Democrats, according to Pew, retained an advantage on less tangible qualities such as empathy, honesty and a willingness to compromise.

As attractive as those characteristics are, they are not top priorities for voters. Both Pew and Gallup have found that, except in times of crisis – for example, in the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks — voters' top priorities consistently include bread-and-butter issues, jobs and the economy.

In September 2006, just before Democrats regained control of the House and Senate, the party held a 30-point advantage, 58-28, on the question, "which party is better able to handle the economy," according to Gallup. Going into the 2014 elections, Gallup found there had been a huge swing on this question, with Republicans now ahead 48-43.

If those numbers do not change significantly before Nov. 8, 2016, it won't matter whether the nominee seeks to strengthen a biracial coalition by broadening white support or by increasing turnout among the party's identity group constituencies. The Democrats' lack of credibility on economic issues will hobble, if not extinguish, the party's prospects. Unless the Democrats develop a coherent, comprehensive strategy for the have-nots, it won't matter whether the party's nominee is Clinton, Webb or anyone else.

New York Observer: "Hillary Clinton's Deafening Silence On Ferguson"

By Lincoln Mitchell

November 26, 2014, 10:15 a.m.

"The frustrations that we've seen," said President Obama in a statement yesterday about recent events in Ferguson, Missouri, "are not just about a particular incident. They have deep roots in many communities of color who have a sense that our laws are not always being enforced uniformly or fairly. That may not be true everywhere, and it's certainly not true for the vast majority of law enforcement officials, but that's an impression that folks have and it's not just made up. It's rooted in realities that have existed in this country for a long time." The comments demonstrate the President's keen understanding of the environment that has contributed to the demonstrations and frustration felt in Ferguson and elsewhere in the U.S. following a grand jury's decision not to indict Darren Wilson. "Next week," the President continued, "we'll bring together state and local officials, and law enforcement, and community leaders and faith leaders to start identifying very specific steps that we can take to make sure that law enforcement is fair and is being applied equally to every person in this country." That sentence should provide great succor to those who want to see few if any changes to the system that produced Darren Wilson and subsequent demonstrations.

Meanwhile, few aspirants hoping to succeed President Obama had much to say about Ferguson.

Most of the Republicans seeking their party's nomination for the presidency in 2016 said little or nothing about the grand jury decision and the events that followed. This was wise and reflected a strategic environment in which Republicans no longer compete for African American votes. By saying anything at all, Republican candidates such as Ted Cruz, Marco Rubio or Bobby Jindal would only risk making a verbal gaffe that would hurt them with the white moderates they need to win in a general election. Somewhat predictably, the most visible Republican presidential candidate in the hours since the grand jury decision has been Rand Paul. Mr. Paul indicated that there is a need for reforms in the criminal justice system and that issues related to drug use and poverty should be addressed as well.

The voice most glaringly absent in recent days has been that of Hillary Clinton. Ms. Clinton the front-running non-candidate for the Democratic nomination for President has, in recent months, not been shy about offering opinions about Ukraine, Isis or President Obama's various foreign policy foibles, but for some reason has not had very much to say about the grand jury's decision or the demonstrations that followed that decision. This is a reflection of Ms. Clinton's generally cautious political style, but also raises questions about Ms. Clinton and the Democratic Party itself.

African Americans are a huge part of the Democratic Party base. It is extraordinary that the party's second most visible leader does not see it necessary or helpful to speak out during a moment that is so important to so many African Americans. There are lots of things that can go wrong for a politician when she speaks out at during times like these, but taking risks defines leadership.

The Missing Exit Strategy for Afghanistan

Tom Andrews

May 6, 2009 | 12:54 pm

President Obama said it best when he talked about U.S. policy in Afghanistan on the CBS news program 60 Minutes last month: “There’s got to be an exit strategy”.

Well, there isn’t one. There is an escalation of 21,000 US forces and there is a wartime spending bill requesting $94.2 billion more for Iraq and Afghanistan. But, as of today, there isn’t even a hint of what the President believes we need - an exit strategy. The Appropriations Committee is expected to dutifully vote out their bill Thursday and send it to the floor of the House for a vote next week.

I realize how hard it would be for Congressional Democrats to require the Obama administration to develop an exit strategy as a condition for continued war funding. After all, this is our guy, right? The last thing our guy needs is a Democratic Congress second guessing, making demands, and putting conditions on the war funding.

But this is exactly what we and the administration need precisely because he is our guy.

Unlike Mr. Limbaugh, we want and need President Obama to succeed. The very real prospect of the United States embedded in an endless war in Afghanistan would undermine everything this administration is trying to do while imperiling the very Congressional Democrats President Obama needs to move his agenda. This is exactly the right time to engage the administration in a respectful but critical discussion about where this military escalation is leading us.

Sending tens of thousands of more U.S. troops into Afghanistan – without a plan to get them out – is a bad idea for many reasons.

First off – the ink on the President’s plan to send an additional 21,000 troops into Afghanistan wasn’t even dry before the Pentagon acknowledged that it already has a request in to the administration for an additional 10,000 troops. What’s worse, there are indications the Pentagon has even more requests waiting in the wings.

The fact is, there are simply not enough U.S. soldiers to secure Afghanistan. Estimates as to what would be required range for 200,000 to 600,000 troops. And, don’t look to our NATO allies to be of any help. The leader of Canada’s Liberal Party told me last week that the only way Canada citizens would support sending any troops was if there was a clear exit strategy with a date certain for their withdrawal. As a result, all Canadian soldiers will be on their way home by 2011.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Those of us who live on this side of the border should be demanding the same from our political leaders.

The lack of an exit strategy is already making things worse in Afghanistan. Failing to say when and how we will remove our forces is playing into the hands of Taliban leaders who are using the presence of our troops on Afghanistan soil–and the announced escalation–as their most powerful recruitment tool. The New York Times reports that the escalation has mended fences between the otherwise fractious leadership of the Pakistani and Afghan Taliban who announced that they are joining forces to fight the new troops as they arrive.

A BBC/ABC public opinion poll of Afghanis reveals that fully 80% of the population is opposed to an escalation of American troops. Many of those who are shooting at our soldiers are not jihadists; they are proud Afghanis who are famously sensitive to the presence of foreign forces on their soil.

The lack of an exit strategy also works against President Obama's regional strategy–outreach to the neighboring nations who have zero interest in a Taliban dominated Afghanistan because it would threaten their national security as much, if not more, than our own. How likely will China, Russia and particularly Iran be to join the U.S. if the outcome might be tens of thousands of U.S. troops on their border?

We need Congress to step up now and help prevent what has now become "Obama's War" from turning into a quagmire that undermines, if not destroys, the critically important agenda the President is fighting to pass here at home.

We need to step up too. We can start by contacting Members of Congress and urging them not to succumb to a vote-now, ask questions later approach to war funding even if it is our guy who is asking for it. We need a critical check-and-balance before it is too late to stop an endless war in Afghanistan.

The war spending bill is on the floor of the House of Representatives next week.

Only a Global Response Can Address a Global Crisis

Washington, D.C.—Last week it became apparent that only a unified international response can stop the global credit crisis. This weekend, a coordinated approach was finally crafted after meetings of the G7, IMF, World Bank, European Union and other international organizations. The international infrastructure of alliances and institutions that was set up after World War II played a crucial role in helping forge a strategy which, by infusing capital into the banking system and guaranteeing interbank loans, has at least for the moment buoyed the markets.

The United States has been the world's financial superpower for decades; it was the engine for creating global financial institutions 50-plus years ago, the driver behind opening global financial markets in recent decades, and the trigger of the current global crisis. Yet the U.S. was a follower, not a leader, in forging an innovative response. Just three weeks ago, senior Administration officials were scoffing at Democrats' proposals to have the government take ownership stakes in banks. Yet that approach is at the heart of the British approach adopted globally this weekend, infusing capital into banks in exchange for equity.

The Bush Administration, it appears, kept on the same ideological blinders that have undermined American leadership, power and prestige over the past eight years. It is hard to imagine how Senator McCain would reverse the trend. His proposals to create a new "League of Democracies," unpopular with even our closest allies, would undermine the global forums that are responding to this crisis, and alienate global actors such as Russia and China who, democracies or no, have a role to play. McCain has in the past derided many of our closest allies with his belligerent rhetoric - especially Germany and France. He would continue the same ineffective international and economic leadership which has characterized the Bush administration and which we can't afford during this time of economic uncertainty.

After weeks of instability, a global response to the worldwide financial crisis is beginning to take shape. "European leaders agreed Sunday on a coordinated rescue plan to guarantee inter-bank lending, inject cash into the banking sector and take other measures to beat back the crisis caused by the global financial meltdown. At an emergency summit in Paris on Sunday evening, the leaders of the 15 nations that use the euro currency announced a Europe-wide plan to guide and coordinate packages that will be announced by national governments starting today. The leaders pledged to work together to prop up banks whose credit activities have been all but frozen in recent days, trying to send a strong message of unity and action before financial markets open today." Meanwhile, U.S. officials are "assembling a 'toolkit' of methods to implement the program, including investing money directly into banks and buying individual mortgages from them." [LA Times, 10/13/08. Washington Post, 10/13/08]

International institutions have facilitated a coordinated international response, playing a stabilizing role amidst economic turmoil. From the G7 to the IMF and World Bank to the European Union, international organizations met this weekend in efforts to curb the current global financial crisis. After individual countries attempted to deal with these problems, there has finally been a recognition that the global markets are so interconnected that only a global response can be effective. Dominique Strauss-Kahn, the Director of the IMF said, "We have now a comprehensive response to the crisis, and I think that the market will reflect it." As a result of this weekend's meetings, global financial markets have made strong gains. "Investors are eager to see cooperation because even if markets perceive that the situation with European banks is improving, those institutions are so closely linked to their U.S. counterparts that continued pessimism about American banks could undermine European governments' efforts." [LA Times, 10/13/08 . WSJ, 10/13/08]

In the age of American capitalism, global leadership during the economic crisis has come from elsewhere. The contours of the global response to the world's financial instability is notable in part because the consensus plan appears to have originated with the UK government, instead of the U.S. "The sweeping measures began early Monday as Britain pledged to spend billions in taxpayer money to shore up battered banks. The British Treasury said the initial steps could be worth $64 billion to three banks. In effect, the moves mean the partial nationalization of those institutions _ the Royal Bank of Scotland, HBOS and Lloyds TSB." "As recently as Sept. 23, senior officials had publicly derided proposals by Democrats to have the government take ownership stakes in banks. The Treasury Department's surprising turnaround on the issue of buying stock in banks, which has now become its primary focus, has raised questions about whether the administration squandered valuable time in trying to sell Congress on a plan that officials had failed to think through in advance." The Bush administration's inability to lead the globe has been evident for the past seven years. It was most evident during the invasion of Iraq but has been evident in other critical issues such as crafting an international response to global warming. The financial crisis is simply the latest example. [NY Times, 10/13/08 . NY Times, 10/12/08]

John McCain's treatment of our international partners diminishes our ability to act globally and hurts our position as a world leader. McCain has said that the G8 should become "a club of leading market democracies: It should include Brazil and India but exclude Russia." McCain would also exclude China from this expanded G8. In the run up to the war in Iraq John McCain charged, "that the [NATO] alliance is failing the test because of the 'flawed calculations' and 'vacuous posturing' of Germany and France." He called these two partners an aging '40s actress "still trying to dine out on her looks but doesn't have the face for it," and a "Rip Van Winkle . . . lack[ing] the political courage and cooperation with its allies on the question of Iraq." McCain has even refused to say whether he would met with Spain's Prime Minister, José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero. This is hardly the language of a leader looking to work with international partners to solve the serious challenges of our time. [John McCain, 2/13/03 . NY Times, 9/30/08 . Reuters, 10/15/07 . Huffington Post, 9/18/08]

PRESS CALL TODAY: Carol Browner and Daniel Weiss on John McCain's Global Warming Speech

WASHINGTON, D.C. – TODAY, Monday, May 12, at 12:00 PM EDT the Center for American Progress Action Fund will host a conference call with Albright Group Principal and former Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Carol Browner and CAPAF Senior Fellow Daniel J. Weiss to discuss John McCain's environmental proposals and questions that remain unanswered after today's speech.

CAPAF has identified three major questions that exist about John McCain's environmental proposals. On today's call, Browner and Weiss will discuss which were answered today, and which were not.

The questions are:

· Will McCain modernize his plan to reflect the latest science?

· Will McCain only support global warming legislation if it heavily relies on nuclear power?

· Will McCain continue to favor tax breaks for oil companies while opposing tax incentives for clean energy?

See backgrounder below for more information.

WHAT: PRESS CALL – McCain Global Warming Plan

WHEN: TODAY, Monday, May 12, 2008 at 12:00 PM EDT

WHERE: By telephone 866.682.6100, ID: McCain Global Warming Plan

WHO: Carol Browner, Principal, the Albright Group LLC, former EPA Administrator, 1993-2001

Questions for Sen. McCain on His Global Warming Speech in Portland, Oregon

On Friday, May 9th, Sen. McCain said, "As president, I will dedicate myself to addressing the issue of climate change globally." But is this rhetoric or real?

1. Will McCain modernize his plan based on the latest science?

His 2003 bill, S. 280 , would achieve a 50% reduction below 2005 levels, while scientists believe that we need an 80% reduction to stave off the worst impacts of global warming.

2. Will McCain only support global warming legislation if it heavily relies on nuclear power?

The Lieberman-Warner Climate Security Act would require a 62%-66% greenhouse gas reduction by 2050. The Senate plans to debate it the week of June 2nd. This bill does not include subsidies for nuclear power, while Sen. McCain's bill would provide $3.7 billion in federal assistance. McCain has said that he would support Lieberman-Warner only "if we have a dramatically increased role for nuclear power….nuclear power has got to be a very big part of any effective action to reduce greenhouse gas emissions."

On Friday, May 9th, the Washington Post reported that the "presumptive GOP nominee didn't say for sure that he would vote for the [Lieberman-Warner] bill." He wants to add subsidies for nuclear power plants – radioactive pork.

Nuclear plants are difficult and expensive to build without significant federal assistance because large scale private lenders are reluctant to invest in them due to huge costs, safety concerns, and radioactive waste disposal problems.

According to the Congressional Research Service , nuclear power received $74 billion (2003$) in subsidies from 1948 to 2003. This was more than half of all energy R&D. The Energy Policy Act of 2005 makes available another $13 billion.

It takes 10-15 years to build a nuclear power plant, but only 18-24 months to build a wind farm. A heavy reliance on nuclear power will delay reductions of greenhouse gases, as well as increase reduction costs compared to efficiency and renewables.

3. Will McCain continue to favor tax breaks for oil companies while opposing tax incentives for clean energy?

On December 13, 2007, the Senate failed to end debate (invoke cloture) on the energy bill because it would have shifted $13 billion in tax breaks from big oil to wind, solar other renewable energy sources, and efficiency. It failed by one vote, 59-40 , with 60 votes required. Sen. McCain was the only senator to miss the vote. Afterward, his spokesperson said that he would have voted with big oil .

On the campaign trail Sen. McCain made it clear that "I oppose subsidies. Not just ethanol subsidies. Subsidies." He opposes subsidies for renewable energy, though the looming expiration of existing renewable energy tax incentives could cost over 100,000 jobs . Yet he continues to support subsidies for big oil and nuclear power.

Please sign this petition my friends. My freedom to live outside of an institution is a life or living death issue for me, all my disabled friends our caregivers and millions of other like us.Our Caregivers could see their already crappy income cut so badly they wont be able to pay their rent! SHOW US THE MONEY! Here's my letter to the New York Times:

Collateral Damage of the Homecare Rules –

In your editorial, "Homecare Rules in the Homestretch," you fail to understand the reality of living on government funded Medicaid and the Russian Roulette pistol aimed at the heads of the Seniors, People with Disabilities and our Home Care Workers who depend on it, every year when budgets are cut. Although overtime pay would be great for IHSS providers, in publicly funded Medicaid programs, states that are cutting IHSS (In Home Supportive Services) are not likely to provide overtime pay and will instead most likely cut hours worked above 159 hours a month for any one provider. There is a big move to push through these Department of Labor rules as written right now with no consideration of how they'll really play out in the homes of Seniors and People with Disabilities and their Caregivers in New York and California where people have over 159 hours of IHSS a month.

I know of a proud union member, a mother over 60, who has multiple disabilities of her own and takes care of her adult son with athetoid cerebral palsy who will see her household income of about $2520 a month in California drop to $1431, as her hours are cut from 280 hours a month to 159 hours. She doesn't have the stamina to supplement her income with more jobs and she has trouble finding other caregivers because her son cannot be understood very well by others. The union has taken over $40 a month from her for check each month to lobby for what will cut her income by a pretty big fraction. 70% of the caregivers in California are family members whose households stay intact with IHSS. A cut in hours can threaten their ability to stay in their homes. Seniors and People with Disabilities with Live in Caregivers will be uprooted as well. Jerry Brown just got done settling a lawsuit trying to cut the IHSS program in California by 20% and settled for cutting it by about 8 percent. Do you really think he's going to take time and a half for over 50,000 providers? His representative on an Olmsted conference said they wouldn't.

When I was in the Young Socialist Alliance in college, before I had my accident, I believed in theories in a vacuum. Then I became disabled and saw how these things work out on a real-life level. In California, we have the most highly advanced In-Home Supportive Services program, and the reason it was so good is that the disabled person received money to find somebody and all of that money went directly to the caregiver. The attendant got all the bang for the buck. And while ADAPT American Disabled for Attendant Programs Today was fighting to get In Home Care, this wonderful program to all the states, they came up with things like "Money Follows the Person" and "Community First Choice Option" where that money continued to go to the disabled person to pay directly to their caregiver with no middleman.

But suddenly all kinds of profiteering is going on as big bad corporations and yes even sometimes big bad unions behaviors are immerging as monied interests smell a beautiful dollar to be made in the graying of the baby boomers. On a good day the union is our greatest blessing on a bad day they are our greatest curse. The only way to come up with a reasonable solution that takes everyone's welfare into account is to sit down and work it out. I think what's been most frightening to me in all of this is the ease with which able-bodied regard People with Disabilities as invisible. The SEIU would not even sit down at the table with People with Disabilities to work out a compromise. Would this happen to a person of color? Are we the last population to be seen as a fraction of a person -- or a person who is really there at all?

People have been making industries of people with disabilities for decades, in the nursing home industry, the charity industry, and now the medical industrial complex and the unions too on a bad day. People from ADAPT clawed our ways out of nursing homes that were profiteering off of us and now we have to fight against the nursing agency industry, managed care corporations, and even at times a union that is so out of touch with its rank and file providers needs that it would create three crappy jobs from one not so good one in order to collect two or three union dues on a one house. It is the people disabilities and rank-and-file providers, who are in a symbiotic relationship, huddled together to keep industries and unions from objectifying us and moving us around like "furniture" in their business plans. You can choose to be naïve and come up with lovely little fairy lands in your own mind, but make no mistake, your naïveté will be paid for by the rank-and-file workers whose pay will be cut badly and people with disabilities who will go back to nursing homes.

The ADAPT-NCIL compromise would simply eliminate the exemption for third party employers, treating Medicaid consumers in consumer directed programs (including public authorities, fiscal intermediaries and agencies with choice) the same as private employers so they can still use the existing exemption. According to the DOL analysis, this change - alone - would eliminate the companionship exemption for 70% of home care workers. It covers all of the "bad players" and concerns raised in the DOL analysis that exist in traditional home care while minimizing the negative impact on people with disabilities and preventing the unexpected consequences such changes would have on real live people in Medicaid funded programs.

WHERE ARE our points of view in this newspaper? In the DOL discussions? Why include us? It's only our bodies, our civil rights, our freedom to live lives akin to political prisoners in institutions! If anyone had any respect for people with disabilities we would have included us in the discussion.

Main Topics: Schunemann, Georgia, Vice Presidential Picks

Summary of Shift:
Discussion on VP picks becomes more protracted as the conventions draw closer. The fact that McCain might pick a pro-choice VP has caused a stir. McCain continues to take a hard line stance against Russian occupation of Georgia, and it was reported that Schunemann, his chief policy advisor, was at one time paid by the Georgian government to lobby to McCain. More Edwards coverage discusses that his wife probably stayed in the marriage because of their children.

Olympics and Georgia remain the most covered stories. Condoleeza Rice is in transit to France to meet with Sarkozy, and following this will head to Georgia in attempt to negotiate over the Russian occupation. U.S. aid has arrived in Georgia to assist with the thousands of displaced persons. In the U.S., reports have shown that foreclosures are up 55% from last year, and by 2042 minorities in the U.S. will become the majority. Additionally, the democratic state chairman of Arkansas was gunned down by a person who appears to have no ties with him.

Schunemann Lobbied McCain while being Paid by the Georgian Government (ABC 08/14/08)
John McCain's foreign policy advisor appears to have close ties to the former Soviet Republic of Georgia. Randy Schuneman and his business partner lobbied the senator will being paid by the Georgian government. For the duration of the campaign Schunemann is taking a leave of absence from the firm.

Highlight #2
Steven Hayes Discusses McCain's Possible Pick of a Pro-Choice VP (FNC 08/14/08)
MEGYN KELLY: Presidential candidate John McCain is just weeks away from the GOP convention, and he is expected to unveil his VP pick any day. And now there are new reports that the presidential hopeful may be considering a pro-choice pick for the #2 spot on his ticket. But would a pro-choice running mate doom the McCain candidacy?

STEVEN HAYES: … I mean, if you look at how the campaign has run itself, … they've made clear that the priority here is getting independent voters and even stealing some democrats, disaffected Hillary voters and others to vote for John McCain. And I think they think that's the key to the victory. The question is, would a pro-choice running mate appeal to that group in such a way that it would offset or counter-balance what they would lose in the Republican base if the Republican base didn't turn out because it was a pro-choice candidate.

KELLY: … Is it a fair assumption that he would lose part of the Republican base if he goes to the pro-choice vice presidential candidate, like Tom Ridge, former governer of Pennsylvania, who McCain mentioned when he made these comments because what's the alternative? No matter who he picks, McCain's further to the right than Obama on the issue of choice.

HAYES: … I don't think it's that voters would necessarily flock to Barack Obama, … pro-life voters, single issue voters, some conservatives who aren't single-issue voters but still take their pro-life stance very seriously might simply stay home... how many people will that be? Is it enough to offset whatever he might gain in independent democrats?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

KELLY: … the Supreme Court is on the docket, so to speak, in this election. And you've got John Paul Stevens pushing 90, uh, the most liberal member of this court. It's very possible in the next four years that he might be replaced. He might step down. If McCain has a pro-choice running mate, given McCain's age, people might worry, somehow, that that person would succeed to the top spot…

HAYES: … he did a town hall in Pennsylvania where he talked specifically about judges, and says look, I think I will have the opportunity to appoint two, maybe three supreme court justices and this is an issue where conservatives are going to like me. I will appoint justices like Roberts, like Elito… the question then would be, given the age factor, how does that play with voters, I mean if McCain is reassuring them that he's going to pick the kind of judges that conservatives are going to like, what would a pro-choice running mate do to that question?

McCain's Stance on Russia and His Advantage With International Crises (ABC 8-14-08)

GEORGE STEPHANOPOLOUS: Well, Diane we see this developing into a major international crisis. Now, with President Bush delaying his vacation, sending humanitarian aide and US troops to help . . . this does have echoes of the Cold War . . . it ends up, I believe, helping in the short run, John McCain. He has been somewhat prescient on this issue. He has long warned of an aggressive, belligerent Russia, said they should be kicked out of the G-8 organization. More and more analysts are coming around to that view right now. Barack Obama is playing it a little more safe . . . I think whenever you've got a major international crisis going, it's likely to play into John McCain's advantage. That is one area where he does till hold an advantage over Obama.

Does it make any sense to whack Steve King for trying to change the Constitution to deny babies born here the right to American citizenship if their parents aren't citizens? Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Town Hall in York, PA 08/12/08

Hello All,
Just got off the phone with our tracker, Jacob, on the ground in York, PA. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS:

- Unprecedented fanfare, incl. pulling Straight Talk Express into the venue itself, Lieberman comments "It's great to be here with Rocky McCain"
- Begins stump with 5 min explanation of situation in Georgia, mentions pipeline and that he spoke to Georgian Pres. to offer support
- Promises we will be "largely" out of Iraq in next 4 years, says "I will bring the peace"
- Says he knows about Three Mile Island, but Navy ships haven't 'had an accident--never a serious accident' w/ nuclear
- Says he understands the problems of Social Security so well that it's a compelling reason for him to be President
- Repeats that he thinks people cherish their 2nd Amendment rights and religion b/c of patriotism
- ONE camp. rep asks his thoughts on poverty as major cause of most of problems we've seen since 9/11, McCain says countries need wherewithal to want positive change themselves, and he won't give aid to corrupt dictators

York, PA: McCain Town Hall 08/12/08

Background Details

- 15-20 demonstrators outside before event: from NOW and local bricklayers - signs hitting McCain's on women's issues and same as Bush on economy [tracker footage available]
- Ticket-only event
- About 2000 people in audience: mostly white, older, casual dress
- Uncharacteristically enthusiastic crowd
- Meghan McCain in bus; Nicole Wallace
- Pre-event fanfare
    - Unusual plethora of RNC paraphenalia outside event
    - Arlen Specter gives brief remarks
    - Showed 2 new videos: (1) showing McCain as sportsman/conservationist like T. Roosevelt (2) showing McCain in POW camp, juxtaposed w/ clips of him cheerleading 'action'
    - Spectacular entrance: Straight Talk Express pulls into venue while 'Rocky' theme plays and giant flag raised
    - sports-event announcing: please welcome Gov. Tom Ridge, Lieberman, and Sen. John McCain. Ton of music and fanfare, like leadup to a big concert (or some sort of... 'celebrity' event)
- Lieberman gives intro remarks
    - "It's great to be here with Rocky McCain"
    - To make sure the crowd is friendly, they put the Dem on first.
    - Why am I as an indep Dem supporting a GOP? B/c we're all Americans.
    - "I am supporting John McCain b/c he is ready to lead America forward- he's the best" (really slow) And in doing so, I'm just following the role model that McCain has been - always put America first, working across party lines to get things done.
    - Choice couldn't be more clear b/t McCain (tested in war and in peace, with experience; always put the country first vs. not -- a talker vs. leader the country needs)
    - never know when America will face a crisis, like in Georgia, and McCain responded strong, clear, principled; the kind of guy we need in the WH
    - We helped create Homeland Security - Bush turned to someone the country needs, Tom Ridge - and

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

since we've not had another terrorist attack in USA

- Tom Ridge gives intro remarks
    - Lieberman said it better than anyone could say it b/c in his heart and his head, he understands the values America needs
    - [story of Lieberman and McCain understand that you run to win and win to govern
    - PA is a state of independents- GOPs are going to support McCain but independents too. Why? America is desperate for leadership - these are perilous times--Russia/Georgia put exclamation point on this-- we need someone ready to lead.
    - There are red states adn blue states - we need a President that is red, white, and blue
    - McCain will bring both natl and internatl leadership

Speech Highlights

- Ridge is a great friend - not an accident we haven't had another we owe a debt of gratitude to "gov. John--Tom Ridge"
- Cong. John Platz in attendance; And arlen specter is here fighting a battle and he's winning
- TY GOPs, Dems, Indeps, libertarians, vegeterians - THs are essence of democracy - we are facing tough times here and abroad and we need great courage; TY vets
- We have to be serious for a few min here - over the past several days, we've seen that internatl aggression is tragically not a thing of the past - we thought we'd put it behind us, but we see it rearing it's head in 21st century. Some Americans might wonder why we should care about Georgia, but history is often made in remote, obscure places and it was made today. Georgia was a 4th century convert to Christianity - if you go to Georgia, as I have several times, you see churches that date back - Georgia's been attacked again and again but have maintained their language and cultural pride. they were part of USSR, but were able to maintain their independence after its dissolution.
- They're at a strategic crossroads - the Russians tried to bomb their pipeline - and I dont have to tell you
- On Fri, Russian troops moved into Georgian province of S Ossetia -- I traveled to S Ossetia and it had a billboard that suggested Russia's ambitions there - on Sat, started bombing apt bldgs, etc. etc. Yesterday Russian troops drove Georgians out of S Ossetia and started up in Khakazia - Georgians asked for a ceasefire and Russians bombed the airport - Yesterday they started attacking other cities, e.g. Gori and Tbisili -- Pres. Mdevev stated he has halted the offensive but reports suggest attacks continue. Foreign minister suggests they want regime change in Georgia and Pres has 'gotta go' --
- Russia has used violence ag/ Georgia to send a signal to any country that seeks to ally with West. We learned at great cost what happens when we let aggression go unchecked. We need independent peacekeeping mission and increased humanitarian, etc. aid
- We need to remind Russian leaders what comes along with being part of civilized countries
- I spoked to Sashkishvili - knows American support is with him and he wanted to give his thanks to you for this tiny little democracy - i told him that i speak for them when i said today we are all Georgians
- these events are a long way from home - the energy crisis that we have today derives in pat from the fact that we get most of our energy from that part of the world - Georgians have a pipeline that carries oil to Caspian Sea
- Another reminder that we need to stop spending billions to countries that don't like us very much
- And the msg we want to send to Washington is Come back from your vacation and fix this problem! Drill here and drill now! Drill offshore! it's no wonder we have 9% Cong approval rating - maybe Arlen, some of your staff is here today, but I'm not so sure about them
- This has been coming for 30 years. We have to have a Lex Project. We have to have an all-of-the-above project. We sit on one of the largest coal reserves - incl. here in PA. We need clean coal - we need to invest $2B in R&D
- Nuclear - I know about Chernobyl and 3 Mile Island, but we've been sailing Navy ships around the world for 60 years and 'we've never had an accident- never had a serious accident'. The French do it. We need to store and reprocess.
- So we can! You hear on the radio we can't we can't we can't - that's not America - America has met every challenge and we can overcome with technology, we can do it. 700k new jobs with 45 nuclear power plants.
- Yesterday we visited locomotive-producing GE - and some think that's not high-tech - but they make the best in the world. So my friends we can do it
- Lieberman is great. Americans are tired of the fighting, the gridlock, the putting our parties above our country - they want us to stand up and do what's right. I have a record of reaching across the aisle adn that's what I will do b/c America wants us to put our country first. We may have disagreeements from time to time and those are healthy and good for us
- I didn't talk to you about the war in Iraq or a lot of things I want to talk to you about, but ever since I was 17

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

and raised my hand and took oath as midshipmen I've always put my country first. Long ago and far away i was offered a chance by the N Vietnamese to leave POW camp early-- 'i'm sure it was b/c my father was a high-ranking Navy admiral' but my friend, Everett Alvarez had been there first and it was against our code of conduct and I will always put my country first

Questions and Answers

- [jokes we have a work-release person here]
- 1Q) How do you plan to help our schools acquire new technology and train our teachers?
    - JM It's very important to provide our newest and best technology. and some of it is spreading-- there are online classes, etc. But, esp in low-income America, there are still blackboards, etc. We need to upgrade technology there. This is the civil rights issue of 21st century. WE all have opportunity to send our kids to school, but is it an opportunity if we send them to a failing school? I want every American to have choice Cindy and I had when we sent our kids to private schools in Phoenix. Charter schools, home-schooling (great cheers). By_upgrading quality of education [?], we'll upgrade our facilities. NCLB was good start, now we have to fix it. Education improvement in NYC and NOLA (charter schools not better than public schools, but theyr'e competition, so the quality has improved). Children should not be penalized for the economic situation they reside in.

- [little girl - when you're done talking, can you sign my book?]
- JM: there was a veteran... was it you, sir? oh! there!

- 2Q) Will you maintain our military to stay at current level or greater? And what will you do for vets' benefits?
    - JM: We have to expand the size of the military adn we're doing that now. One of the many mistakes in Iraq was that we didn't expand the size of the military and we've put enormous strain on Guard and Reserve.
    - Yes, incl. educational benefits. And another thing. We've had an increase in PTSD and good news - we've been able to save more ppl b/c of efficiency in getting ppl from battlefield to medical care. So we need to increase our ability to treat PTSD and those battle wounds. But for avg vets in need of routine care, they should have a plastic card to go to physician of their choice and not have to wait in line to wait in line.

- 3Q) For those of us who are headed into miliitary service, how are things going to look for us in next 4 years?
    - JM: By end of next 4 years ,we will be largely out of Iraq. And not bc wev'e set a date for withdrawal, but b/c we will ahve one. But that withdrawal will be based on conditions on the ground, not on a set date for withdrawal. Obama said sruge wouldnt work, voted not to fund men and women fighting there, still refuses to acknowledge it's succeeded; hadn't been there in over 900 days and gave a speech before he went--hard to believe. So there's a great difference. He wanted us out last March. The surge has succeeded, Petraeus is great. Men and women like you are the greatest and I'm proud of you. "We have succeeded--it's not we are succeeding--we have succeeded and we are winnign" and if we had had this convo 2 wks ago, we wouldnt have consumed our convo with tiny little Georgia. I've been in wars, i know wars, I hate wars - no one hates war more than the vet. So at the end of 4 years, I will bring the peace

- 4Q) Value of homes is declining. Plans to turn it around?
    - JM: These are tough times in America. I shouldve mentioned it. The housing crisis is probs one of the most if not the most severe aspect of it b/c it's the American Dream. We just passed thru the Senate something that will incentivize ppl to stay in their homes. And I hope we dont' get to this b/c Senate bill will work--What I'd like to see is a homeowner to be able to get a 30 year FHA mortgage rate at new value of home--not the person who bought 2 houses and let them idle hoping the value would increase.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- 5Q) What will you do to bring jobs?
    - [gov-chow line joke]
    - JM: We can bring jobs to PA and the heartland of America. At GE plant, they make the most efficient and fuel-efficient locomotives in the world. And they're hiring b/c demand overseas is going up, e.g. Brazil. And i mentioned nuclear, creating jobs. I believe USA will lead in green technology and green innovation. So if you have a fundamental faith in America, then you know we're the best workers, best producers. Every technology has come from USA. We will become energy independent. Yes we have challenges: education, housing. But somehow to believe America is not capable of this is a fundamental contradiction of teh history of this country. And I believe in it.

- 6Q) For the longest time you didn't have an Ag policy. now you do - hooray! but yours now is based on foreign trade. How do you plan for us to become energy independent in terms of what goes into your body? Problems for farmers w imports and exports.
    - JM: I believe US farmers are best in the world and can compete w/ best of the world. And i think it's outrageous that our biggest overseas market for our products, Colombia, whose leader BTW just carried out a daring rescue, and Pelosi refuses to hold a vote on trade agreement with them. And Pelosi also won't hold vote on drilling. I say things you sometimes dont like. I opposed ethanol subsidies b/c they distort the market.

- 7Q) Conservatives believe you dismiss our requests for serious conservative stance on issue. In your quest for POTUS, is it in you to take a serious stance with conservative policy to fight the lure of socialistic policies and the Dems?
    - JM [pretends to grimace / sigh]: Yes.
    - Can I say something: Judges. 2-3 vacancies on SCOTUS "according to ppl who decide these things"-- err, [corrects himself] Alito and Roberts were 2 of the greatest justices we ever had. Obama didn't support them. I will only nominate strict-constructionists.

- 8Q) I'm paying into a SS system that I'm not going to reap benefits from. What's your proposal?
    - JM: jokes- 'I should've recognized the guy behind you.' Sometimes we have to have straight talk. Benefits won't be there unless we fix the system. If there's ever a compelling argument for bipartisanship, it's SS. Why should we lay a multitrillion dollar debt on next generation of Americans? Ridge and I came to DC together - I was proud to be there w/ only other Viet vet. and btw, he graduated Harvard and could've gotten deferment, but he served in Vietnam - so we came and SS broken, adn O'Neill and Reagan worked together and fixed SS for 25 years. So we have an example. Lieberman and I aren't going to invent a way. I understand SS problem so well that I think I should be your next POTUS.

- 9Q) I was a diehard HRC fan. I'm deciding between you adn Obama. I'm not sure where you stand. Where do you stand on college; gas prices?
    - JM: First of all, I appreciate that you would take the time to be a part of this. Also, on HRC- she ran a great campaign, she inspired young women. Education-- if your grades are good, universities adn colleges are competing to get you. We've got to make education affordable. Like healthcare, we've got double-digit inflation on education. This fall might be a problem of availability of student loans - we need to make sure Governors will keep that from being a problem.
    - JM: If you have specialty like math, science, engineering, we need to find a way to keep you in school b/c we need that. And I say this w/ my daughter who graduated with degree in Art History.
    - And 2nd thing, we need to reward service, e.g. TFA, Peace Corps. I will continue to expand those programs and their rewards. And rewards should be last thing to motivate toward service, but we need to provide educational benefits.
    - And tell your friends to come. Some straight-talk, I need to do a better job w/ young voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- 10Q) Costs of health care and uncertainty of Medicare.
    - JM: Before the housing crisis, HC was #1 issue at town hall mtgs. Prob is system today has no real breaks or incentives to bring down costs. I'd like to give families $5k tax credit so they can go across state lines and get HC they need. Health and wellness (Shaq's challenge). What about so-called uninsurables? We're going to have to advocate GAPs w/ contributions by state and fed so we can pool risks and provide HC. If you like govt-run HC systems, go to Canada or England and see if you like it - that's what Obama's proposing. We have to preserve quality of HC, and improve accessibility and affordability

- JM: ONE organization is here. Cindy & co went to Rwanda with them, where there were 800k killed. Adn btw, it was inspired by Bono.
- ONE rep: we realized after 9/11 that a lot of the probs USA faces, incl. military, is result of poverty around the world. What is your plan for combating that?
    - JM: 1 of the ways for addressing all this that Cindy saw and Huckabee and Frist saw -- and BTW, best line of debates was Huckabee's 'jesus would be smart enough not to run for public office'. One of the most impressive parts of Rwanda was the women, who have decided theyre not going to stand for this and are assuming poistions of responsibility and power. These countries need wherewithal to make postive change themselves. Aid money we give these 3rd world countries end up in Swiss bank accounts and I won't stand for it. Bill Gates and etc do great work Provide help but not to corrupt govts.

- we're going to be up late on Election Night. And I'm the underdog and I love it, I always relish that position. I don't believe Pennsylvanians cherish their 2nd Amendment rights or their religion b/c they're bitter, but b/c they love America. And I'll tell them they're the heart of America. And they're why the ppl of Georgia are looking to America. We will continue to be beacon of hope.

Subject: CGSGI CEO Executive Search

John:

I hope your trip is going well.

I wanted to follow up with you on a major project we are working on - the executive search for the CEO of CGSGI. We have retained Russell Reynolds for the search, and we are working with Annie Simonds from their Washington DC office. They have identified a number of viable candidates and we are scheduled to conduct in-person interviews in NY on December 7th and 8th, with follow up interviews on December 19th and 20th.

Bruce is on the search committee but obviously hasn't been able to participate these past few weeks. In addition to myself and Annie Simonds, the other members are Christy Louth, Executive Director of CGSGI Canada, and Eric Nonacs, a member of the CGSGI Steering Committee and of the CGSGI Canada Board of Directors, whom you may know. Christy will particpate in the December 7th & 8th interviews, but is not available for the follow up interviews, and Eric is unfortunately not available for either. We were counting on Bruce to add an important management perspective, but I am not sure if he will be able to participate. If he is not able, would you be able to help, particularly for the first round on December 7th and 8th? It will be important to have good representation on our end not only to evaluate the candidates but also to attract them to the position. I know you have a very full plate, but if your schedule would be able to accommodate this, the search firm would of course brief you on the candidate slate, and will be preparing a summary of specific questions and areas we will want to explore in our interviews with candidates. There will be a total of 8 candidates to speak to on 12/7 & 12/8, with the objective of narrowing the field to 4 candidates for the 2nd round later that month.

Another alternative could be to reschedule the interviews for January, but the objective has been to move this along at an aggressive pace as Frank Giustra is very eager to fill this position (it has been vacant since mid-year). Once we agree on the second-round candidates, we could also fly the candidates out to San Francisco where Eric is based.

I would appreciate your bringing this up with Bruce when you next speak, and your thoughts on the possible alternatives if he is not available. Thanks and safe travels.

Terry

McCain spent this week focused on energy. On Monday, he announced he reversed his previous stance calling to end for the federal ban on offshore drilling. The following day, President Bush announced that he also supports an end to the ban. Later in the week, McCain appeared to be open to drilling in ANWR. PMUSA and our partners worked to frame McCain and the same as Bush on energy, to point out McCain's flip-flop and to paint McCain as a friend to Big Oil, not families.

RESEARCH: The research team put together documents on McCain's missed votes and votes against increased fuel efficiency and renewable energy, McCain's lobbyist connections to Big Oil, and how McCain and Bush are the same on energy policies. We posted these documents to McCainSource.com, shared them with our partners and sent them to reporters.

PRESS: PMUSA worked with the League of Conservation Voters, Sierra Club, Americans United for Change and Friends of the Earth released statements criticizing McCain's push for offshore drilling. PMUSA sent our McCain oil research document to Senator Reid, Rep. Markey, Rep. Pelosi and Rep. Emanuel. Senator Reid and Congressman Markey spoke out against McCain's position and today Congressman Emanuel sent a letter to McCain asking if he would drill in the Great Lakes. Campaign Money Watch released a report connecting McCain's support for offshore drilling with his ties to the energy industry.

- "'John McCain's big money donors and lobbyist friends have struck again,' said David Donnelly, director of Campaign Money Watch. 'McCain's reversal on off-shore drilling is a blatant pitch for donations at today's Houston fundraising events.' McCain's speech on energy policy, which he is scheduled to deliver today in Houston, comes on the same day that Campaign Money Watch is releasing a report on McCain's connections to the energy sector, including the oil, gas and nuclear power industries. The report can be viewed at http://www.campaignmoney.org/mccainenergy. " [Campaign Money Watch, 6/17/08]
- "Congress passed a permanent ban on drilling in the lakes in 2005 and McCain isn't likely to suggest drilling in such a habitat. But that doesn't stop Emanuel from closing: 'I hope your newfound stance on offshore drilling will not be followed by support for drilling in the Great Lakes.'" [Politico , 6/20/08]
- "Instead of siding with the hardworking American families being exploited by an energy industry awash in record profits, Senator McCain supports allowing Big Oil to begin the wholesale 'exploitation' of our coasts. Rather than offering consumers real relief from skyrocketing energy prices, Senator McCain's plan would merely pad Big Oil's bottom line while putting thousands of miles of pristine beaches and coastline at risk." [Sierra Club , 6/17/08]
- "Just mentioning the words 'renewable energy' doesn't hide the fact that Senator McCain is now embracing the outdated energy policies of the past," LCV President Gene Karpinski said. "If Senator McCain is serious about ending our addiction to oil and helping working families with inefficient cars, why has he voted against or missed every fuel efficiency bill since 1990? Drilling in protected areas offshore won't solve our energy needs in the short term and in the long term, will increase the threat of global warming. We need to break our addiction to oil — not look for another fix." [League of Conservation Voters, 6/17/08]
- "If John McCain were looking for a way to prove he's running for George Bush's third term, he couldn't do better than this. Maybe we should start calling him 'Exxon John.'" [Friends of the Earth Action, 6/16/08]
- "'Senator McCain and President Bush just couldn't bare the agony of being apart on this major environmental issue for even a day' said Jeremy Funk, spokesman for Americans United for Change. 'It didn't matter that they are already of one mind on everything from endless war in Iraq to more tax breaks for millionaires to privatizing Social Security – there was now this pesky difference on off-shore drilling and they just had to nip it in the bud, for the sake of the McBush relationship'" [Americans United for Change, 6/18/08]

PROGRESSIVEACCOUNTABILITY.ORG worked with Marc Ambinder to get him to post a story on McCain's comments at a Missouri town hall where he seemed open to drilling in ANWR. Following Ambinder's post, LCV and Sierra Club released statements hitting McCain. McCain was forced to address the issue.

- "He then volunteered that he had changed his position on offshore oil drilling, which he now supports, because of the rising price of oil. Asked if the high price of oil tempts him to reconsider drilling in ANWR, he said: 'No, but again, if somebody says, 'will you look at this information?' …I'll be glad to look at that information. I think it's incumbent on me to review it. But I certainly haven't changed my position.'" [Wall Street Journal , 6/20/08]

PAID MEDIA: Sierra Club ran a radio ad in several Ohio media markets calling attention to Senator McCain's ironic use of windmills in Ohio TV advertising despite his failure to support renewable energy initiatives in the Senate, and asking him to vote for incentives for wind power and other renewables when they come up on the floor.

ONLINE: PROGRESSIVEACCOUNTABILITY.ORG created a web video that shows how McCain and Bush are the same on offshore drilling.

Here are some of the stories that used our frame:

"McCain's energy plan gets positive reception; Most oil execs respond favorably as he touts policy and raises funds in campaign trip here" [Houston Chronicle , 6/18/08]

"While McCain has traditionally sided with environmentalists on climate change, he has a mixed voting record on oil drilling and support for renewable energy." [Washington Post , 6/17/08]

"He's been saying well look I broke with President Bush on global warming but on the other hands, he and the President are in lockstep now on increasing more oil drilling and so that could really complicate Senator McCain's efforts to reach out to independent voters…" [Wolf Blitzer, CNN's The Situation Room, 6/18/08]

"Well while President Bush calls for an end to the federal moratorium on offshore drilling, it might be a good time to point out that Republican presidential nominee John McCain has uh been pitching that for two days." [Megyn Kelly, FOX News, 6/18/08]

The End of "The Maverick" Vaneer

In the last few weeks, McCain has run from endorsing bi-partisan climate change legislation in the Senate and startled many with his reaction to a Supreme Court ruling on detainees. We framed McCain's embrace of offshore drilling as the death blow to McCain's maverick image is gone.

We put together a memo for the Sunday shows that highlights all the opinion pieces which have declared the Maverick as gone. The memo also included polling information on how many people believe McCain will continue Bush's policies, data on how McCain is unpopular with his base and how McCain has moved to the right on his "Maverick" issues to please the base.

Here are some of the stories about the end of the Maverick.

- "Yet while it would be hard to categorize him as a doctrinaire Republican or conservative, Mr. McCain appears to have ceded some of his carefully cultivated reputation as a maverick." [Elisabeth Bumiller, New York Times , 6/17/08]
- "It wasn't too many years ago that 'maverick' was the cliche of choice in describing him. But that term didn't even make the list this year when voters were asked by the Pew Research Center to sum up McCain in a single word…Voters have notoriously short memories, but it could be argued that McCain cheapened his own brand. He embraced President Bush and attempted to become, like Bush, the choice of the Republican establishment." [Paul West, Baltimore Sun , 6/15/08]
- "The man once celebrated for his informality with reporters emerged in a severe gray suit and stood in front of four American flags, flared with the help of adhesive tape. He scolded one reporter for asking a question without raising her hand. One star correspondent, arriving a few minutes late for the event, was forced to wait outside until McCain finished." [Dana Milbank, Washington Post , 6/17/08]
- "But McCain needs to win independents to win the presidency, and there are indications that the McCain 'brand' -- his image as an independent maverick -- has been damaged in the past few years." [Jake Tapper, ABC News , 6/20/08]
- "I like McCain, and I promised myself I'd defend him against any Democratic effort to blur his record with Bush's. I didn't anticipate that the erstwhile maverick would be making it harder to distinguish between the two." [Brian Dickerson, Detroit Free Press , 6/20/08]

McSame

The McSame frame continues to gain traction, including a front page New York Times story this week.

- How Close McCain Is to Bush Depends on the Issue

  "— The Democrats like to say that electing Senator John McCain would usher in the third term of George W. Bush , and they do not mean it as a compliment. The Republicans counter that calling the senator "McBush" is political spin and that Mr. McCain is his own man. A look at Mr. McCain's 25-year record in the House and Senate, his 2008 campaign positions and his major speeches over the last three months indicates that on big-ticket issues — the economy, support for continuing the Iraq war, health care — his stances are indeed similar to Mr. Bush's brand of conservatism. Mr. McCain's positions are nearly identical to the president's on abortion and the types of judges he says he would appoint to the courts." [New York Times , 6/17/08]

- Fix Pick: 'McSame' as Bush? John McCain = George W. Bush.

  "For much of the last few months, Democrats and their affiliate groups have worked hard to ensure voters become familiar with that equation… And, according to a new poll conducted by the Washington Post and ABC News voters are internalizing the message. Thirty eight percent of those surveyed said McCain would take the country in a 'new' direction, while 57 percent said a McCain administration would mostly keep America on the 'same' course." [Washington Post , 6/18/08]

Trade

McCain gave a speech on free trade in Canada today. Our research team pulled together a document on McCain's record and many of his insensitive statements about the jobs not coming back. We shared this document with our partners.

AFL-CIO hosted a press conference call to respond to McCain's speech. The call featured Senator Sherrod Brown and a worker.

- "Instead of delivering a speech from Ottawa, Canada, Senator McCain should visit Ottawa, Ohio, where the Phillips plant closed," [Sen.] Brown said. "We need trade policies that create new jobs at home, not ship them to Mexico. We need a new direction, not a third Bush term." [AFL-CIO release, 6/20/08]

FISA

Congress is voting on a FISA compromise today. Our research team put together a document outlining how McCain aides Charlie Black and Wayne Berman ran a secretive lobbying campaign for retroactive immunity while working on the McCain Campaign. The document also shows that McCain has received lots of money from the telecom industry and supports the industry position on this issue.

We gave this document to Talking Points Memo who will write a story on it. We also gave this document to reporters who have been working on FISA.

Oil in Iraq

This week it was announced that top U.S. oil companies will receive no-bid oil contracts in Iraq. Research put together a document on McCain's lobbyist ties to Big Oil and contractors in Iraq. Talking Points Memo is working on a story about it for next week.

In the States

This week saw Senator McCain stopping in Iowa and Minneapolis, MN. Alliance for a Better Minnesota hosted two events, launched two websites, and conducted a visibility outside of the event using the "McSame" frame. Next week, the Senator will be in California, Colorado and Ohio. California and Colorado will focus on the immediate economic and environmental impacts of McCain's proposal to conduct more drilling for oil, while Ohio will demand more immediate actions to lower Ohioans' gas bills.

Iowa
Due to the continued natural disaster, coverage in the mainstream media has been hard to come by. However, surrogates we've been working with had their own message to give Senator McCain.

McCain earmark opposition assailed
By JANE NORMAN
Des Moines Register

Washington, D.C. - Republican presidential candidate John McCain opposed legislation last year that included money for flood control in Des Moines, which shows he is wrong to push for reforms to the congressional earmark system, a Democratic lawmaker charged Thursday.

State Sen. Jack Hatch of Des Moines said the earmarked money was needed to relieve water problems on the city's north side, which were magnified over the weekend when a levee break forced an evacuation of the Birdland area and ruined several dozen homes and businesses.
[Snip]
President Bush eventually vetoed the bill, which authorized more than 900 navigation, flood-control and environmental projects across the country. A report on the bill said the Des Moines metropolitan area suffered more than $152 million in flood damage in 1993.
"The Birdland Park and Central Place levees on the Des Moines River failed during the 1993 flood event and do not provide reliable flood protection, placing nearly 200 homes and businesses at risk," the report said.
Every member of the Iowa congressional delegation voted to override Bush's veto, the first override of his presidency.
McCain strongly backed Bush.
"This legislation is fundamentally flawed, authorizing nearly 1,000 new projects without any method for prioritizing the needs of our national water infrastructure," he told the Senate. He added that the bill was "full of pork projects and unchecked government spending." [Des Moines Register, 6/20/08]

McCain: Same As Bush On Oil
Written by: Gordon Fischer, 6/18/2008 9:41 AM

MCCAIN JUST LIKE BUSH ON OFFSHORE DRILLING
This week both McCain and Bush push oil industry plan to end to the federal ban on offshore drilling.
On energy issues, McCain and Bush share an agenda aimed at helping Big Oil. Yesterday, both Bush and McCain called for an end to the federal moratorium on offshore drilling. Additionally, McCain has repeatedly voted against and skipped votes on renewable energy and increased fuel efficiency.
McCain has a dismal 24% lifetime rating from the League of Conservation Voters .

Big Oil loves McCain, like they love Bush.
Today's Houston Chronicle headline on McCain's speech reads: "McCain's energy plan gets positive reception; Most oil execs respond favorably as he touts policy and raises funds in campaign trip here"
McCain has received more than $1 million from the oil & gas industry according to a Campaign Money Watch analysis of data from the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics Center.
Like Bush, McCain is surrounded by Big Oil lobbyists. At least 22 staffers or fundraisers for McCain's campaign have lobbied for Big Oil. They have represented 5 of the 9 oil companies in the 2008 Fortune 200.
Like Bush, McCain offers billions in tax cuts for Big Oil, but no relief for families. According to the Center for American Progress Action Fund,McCain's tax plan gives nearly $4 billion in tax breaks to the top five American oil companies, but gives families very little. Economists have panned McCain's gas tax holiday, saying it won't help families with gas prices. [Iowa True Blue, 6/18/08]

Minnesota
Minnesota was graced with McCain's presence at an "undecided voters" town hall and fundraiser. They hosted two events, one with foreclosure victims in partnership with ACORN and another with veterans focused on the GI Bill with VoteVets. In addition to holding a "McSame" presence outside of the fundraiser , they released two websites.

McCain v Minnesota is focused on the impacts of the Iraq War has had on funding in Minnesota, Senator McCain's health care plan, and foreclosure numbers tied with McCain's personal housing wealth.

Pawlenty Poker . In preparation for Governor Pawlenty receiving the VP nod, which has received a lot of buzz recently, Alliance for a Better Minnesota is targeting Pawlenty as a run-of-the-mill Conservative that has harmed Minnesota's interests. The website is a poker game, where the player acts as Pawlenty betting away important MN infrastructure funding in order to "Win" the grand prize, a VP nod. Play the game to see fun special appearances from other lawmakers.

McCain's Minnesota visit met by anti-war protesters
by Mark Zdechlik , Minnesota Public Radio, June 19, 2008

Minneapolis — Protesters who plan to march during the Republican National Convention in St. Paul in September got a warm-up Thursday with presidential candidate John McCain visiting the Twin Cities for two appearances.

Outside the Hilton Hotel in downtown Minneapolis on Thursday afternoon, about 100 people peacefully demonstrated during a fund raising event for John McCain.

About a dozen more chanted outside McCain's townhall meeting at the Landmark Center in St. Paul.

Union protesters

But antiwar protester Meredith Aby says today's turnout will not even compare to the tens of thousands of protesters expected to march on the Republican convention.

"The RNC is going to be huge. The September 1 demonstration is on day when nobody has to go to work, unlike today, and that we've been building for, for years, whereas his demonstration is something that was called for two weeks ago, but even trying to figure out his schedule has been very hard, even trying to figure out where to organize something at," Aby said.

About two-thirds of those assembled appeared to be anti-war protesters who want to end the war in Iraq. Union members also demonstrated calling for greater access to health insurance.

There was a heavy police presence, but there were no arrests.

One Republican Party official said he expected several hundred people to attend McCain's fundraiser.

The townhall meeting was an invitation-only event for 200 undecided voters the campaign said it identified through a telephone marketing firm.

One of the protesters was Gary Struss, with the Sheetmetal Workers union, Local 10. He said a McCain administration will be a continuation of President Bush's policies.

"I'm gonna protest Mc Bush being John McCain and his failed policies because his policies are the same as George Bush and they have failed America," Struss said.

The protests were largely peaceful. One man was arrested for trying to enter the townhall event, which was closed and guarded by security officers. [MN Public Radio, 6/19/08]

McCain's pitch: Republican Pledging to fight hard in Minnesota to win the presidency
By Bill Salisbury and Rachel E. Stassen-Berger, 06/20/2008

Outside the hotel, anti-war activists and union members formed a crowd that exceeded 100. About three dozen Minneapolis police officers were stationed around the hotel. There were no incidents.

Meredith Aby, a lead organizer of a planned protest march at the September Republican National Convention in St. Paul, spoke into a bullhorn as motorists passed by. A sign reading "McBush" seemed to be the most popular, and the crowd was decidedly younger than those attending the fundraiser.

"He says this state's in play for the 2008 election, and I just don't think that's true," Aby said. "Minnesotans value peace, and they value justice, and I don't think he values either of those things." [Pioneer Press, 6/20/08]

New Mexico

Letter to the Editor

Green Development Benefits from Federal Tax Relief
Juan Reynosa

Hobbs has a great opportunity to become the hub of energy production in New Mexico, not just within the oil industry, but also within the emerging realm of renewable energy. Solar and wind industries are growing rapidly in our country, and with the introduction of the Lieberman-Warner bill, Congress is aiming to give economic development incentives to both of these renewable energy sectors.

Not only is it one of the greatest economic opportunities for rural communities right now, but it also provides opportunities to young people with barriers to employment by providing career pathways to green jobs.

Hobbs has always been on the forefront of oil and gas production, and it is this fact that has helped the town survive throughout many economic fluctuations. Yet with increasing gas prices and peak oil production on the horizon, New Mexicans in Hobbs have an opportunity to diversify our economic development strategy to include other energy sources that are as readily available as oil is: solar and wind energy.

New Mexico has consistently strived for more economic development throughout the state and you can see this in Hobbs with the development of the casino/racetrack, the prison, and the new nuclear enrichment plant. Yet solar and wind power, besides offering a cleaner form of energy, have much more to offer. There are many tax incentives, rebates, and credits attached to implementing these energy sources and the jobs created by these industries, especially for young people, are career ladder jobs with benefits and almost always have to pull from the local job market. Renewable Energy: Time to Go Forward
By eli il yong lee - Jun 16th, 2008

The Consumer Price Index, the key measure of inflation, just went up to 4.2%. The US Department of Labor places the blame squarely on rising fuel costs.

Last Friday's Albuquerque Journal editorialized, "If Tecton strikes natural gas, the drilling needs to be done in compliance with strict standards on air quality, noise and visual pollution. There's a long way to go before alternative energy sources free us from reliance on fossil fuel. In the meantime, we simply don't have the luxury of arbitrarily blocking oil and gas."

Has anyone asked Westsiders how they feel about having drilling in their backyard? And just when would the Journal like to get started on developing alternative energy sources? When gas hits $9 a gallon, like it is in many parts of Europe?

It seems like America's reliance on oil has gotten us to where we are now - windfall profits by fossil fuel executives, exorbitant gas prices, runaway global warming, and climate crises like Katrina and the recent flooding in Iowa.

America needs renewable energy now. Starting new fossil fuel endeavors is a step backward, not forward. [Clearly New Mexico, 6/16/08]

Ohio
Next week, Senator McCain will be swinging through Ohio. In advance of his visit, ProgressOhio distributed an email about gas prices to its list and received an overwhelming response. People are submitting their feelings, and they are very upset about how closely McCain has aligned himself with big oil.

Tell McCain How Much You're Paying At The Pump

Gas prices have hit an all-time high. Our country is in the midst of a recession, thanks in part to our crippling dependence on oil. Here in Ohio, families are struggling with the impact of $4-per-gallon prices.

But maybe John McCain has been too busy fundraising with Texas oil billionaires lately to hear about it.

Click here to tell John McCain how much you're paying, and how gas prices are hurting your family.

- McCain Voted Against Taxing Oil Companies to Finance a Tax Rebate For Consumers. McCain voted twice against a measure that would have provided an income tax rebate to Americans by temporarily taxing enormous oil company profits.
- McCain Voted Against Reducing Dependence On Foreign Oil. He voted against legislation calling on the President to submit a plan to reduce foreign petroleum imports by 40 per cent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Since launching his campaign in 2007, Senator McCain has skipped out on every key environmental vote the Senate has considered. In one instance, his absence killed the rollback of billions of dollars in tax breaks for the oil and gas industry to invest in renewable energy tax credits. McCain was the one senator not voting.

When Senator McCain swings through Ohio next week after his trip to Texas, we'll have a message for him. But we need your help.

Let us know how much you're paying at the pump, and the impact it's having on your family. We'll compile those responses and send them to McCain's Senate office.

Click here to tell John McCain how much you're paying, and how gas prices are hurting your family.

A few responses:

"Senator McCain, if these prices continue I will need to reduce the amount I contribute to my 401k as the cost of my medical insurance has increased by 33%, to say nothing of the cost of food. Drilling for more oil is not the answer, oil companies need to invest in new technology."

"High gas prices, which have nothing to do with either over-regulation or with "homeland security" concerns, have forced me to rethink the necessity of every trip I would make in my car, whether for work, chores, or pleasure. It now costs me nearly thirty dollars to fill the same exact gas tank I used to fill for barely twelve. Nothing in terms of the alleged "War on Terror" can sufficiently explain such a spike, but rampant giveaways, deliberate choking of supply, and sociopathic profiteering does. Big Oil is is deep in YOUR pocket, Senator, and their interests clearly trump those of the American people in your mind. This makes you unsuitable to represent us in OUR White House."

"My husband and I are retired. I have to travel to a nursing home daily to help my 93 year old mother. It takes a tank of gas to visit my grandchildren in Cleveland, so we can't go very often.
We need to remove speculators from fixing oil prices and require refineries to prove they are off line and not faking it to increase prices.
There is plenty of oil for Americans to use if there was honesty within the oil companies. GREED is the major problem not shortages. Opening up offshore and Alaska might help 10 years from now,but by that time we had better have alternative energies or vehicles to transport us.
You know all the lobbiests by their first names tell them you are fighting for middle class Americans not the oil barons from now on."

"This has impacted my single person business more than anything, in that clients have to come to me, and my business seems to be affected by that. More importantly, it is easy to see why Bush & Co. are twiddling thumbs in the White House -- they want the situation to get bad enough to make their dreams of more off-shore drillling come true. If John McCain does not distance himself from this obvious political mischief and self-serving ineptitude by resisting such obvious ploys from the present administration, he will be nothing more than a lackey for the folks he'd like to avoid."

John Nichols: Call out New York Times on McCain/Bush comparison
John Nichols — 6/19/2008 10:53 am

Recalling the worst of Judith Miller's reporting on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, the New York Times ran one of its "fair and balanced" stories on the presidential race Monday.

The piece, which purported to assess similarities and differences between unpopular Republican President George Bush and hoping-to-be-popular Republican presidential candidate John McCain, was another example of how major media in the U.S. seek to portray a relatively predictable conservative as a free-thinking political "maverick."

The folks at Fairness and Accuracy in Reporting (FAIR), the media watchdog group created in the tradition of pioneering media critic -- and brilliant reporter -- I.F. Stone, are appropriately upset with the Times. [snip entire FAIR takedown of NYT piece, highlighting enviro similarities][Capitol Times, 6/19/08]

Wineke: McCain hates war? I don't believe that.
Bill Wineke bwineke@madison.com JUN 17, 2008
John McCain says he "hates war." I know he says that because a television ad saying so appears on my set at least once or twice every hour.
McCain says he "hates" war because his father and his grandfather were admirals, because he flew jets during the Vietnam War and because he spent five years as a prisoner of war.
Those would all be good reasons to hate war. They are all good reasons for us to admire and respect John McCain and his family.

But there is a ringer in McCain's ads. The ringer is this: John McCain most assuredly does not hate war.

He was an enthusiastic backer of the Iraq War before we invaded Iraq. He has backed the war every day since we invaded. His differences with the Bush adminstration are not over whether we should have invaded Iraq in the first place but are over whether we should have waged the war more aggressively once we started it.

McCain's prescription for what America should do next in Iraq is more of the same.

That's a legitimate point of view and it deserves legitimate debate. But to introduce that point of view by saying "I hate war" is disingenous, to say the least. [Madison Capitol Times, 6/17/08]

Marc Perkel: The problem is McCain's judgment, not his age
Dear Editor:
John McCain's campaign is accusing Democrats of ageism because they say McCain is "confused," "oblivious," and "out of touch." But this isn't a criticism of McCain's age because Bush is far younger than McCain and Bush is also confused, oblivious, and out of touch. McCain is just like Bush, who is a young, vigorous guy.
The problem with McCain isn't his age, it's his poor judgment. It's not that McCain is too old, it's that McCain, like Bush, is just plain wrong and he hasn't learned anything from Bush's mistakes.

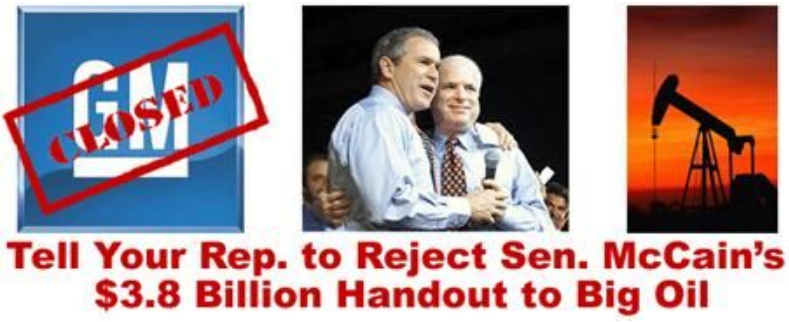
Blog/Email list outreach



One Wisconsin Now has launched a petition to Wisconsin's Congressional Delegation demanding that they stand against Senator John McCain's plan to giveaway $4 billion in new tax breaks to his friends in Big Oil. In 2006, Bush and McCain supported budget giveaways of $5 billion in tax cuts. This at a time when working people are struggling to pay $4-a-gallon gas prices and Big Oil companies are raking in records profits. One company pocketed as high as $7 billion in only one quarter recently.

According to a report from the Captial Times, "The unprecedented rise in gasoline prices helped put 2,600 General Motors employees out of work in Janesville." That plant is scheduled to close as early as the end of 2009. It is pretty clear that the pain at the pump is spreading quickly to many other areas of our economy, especially in working family wallets. Take a moment to sign a petition to your representative in Congress! Tell them to reject the Bush/McCain policies of more tax giveaways to an industry that has devoured so much and given back so little. [OneWisconsinNow.org, 6/20/08]

Drilling Himself in the Foot -- Even Oiled up McCain Has No Where to Move
By Keith Schmitz
The president today is going to announce a push on Congress to open up off-shore locations for oil drilling. This is not smart on many levels -- it will take ten years to get black gold, the oil companies will only sell it overseas anyways, the price of oil will drop just pennies, conservation will do us better over the long term.
But unlike Kramer on Seinfeld Bush doesn't do levels.
He is also not doing John McCain any favors. Turns out Barack Obama has a post primary bounce, especially in Florida.
Turns out that bounce may go higher. There are some places where NIMBYism towards off-shore drilling won't play well.
Florida is one of them. [Folkbum's Rambles and Rants, 6/18/08]

McSame on Offshore Drilling
By Cory @ One Wisconsin Now - Jun 19th, 2008 at 9:28 am EDT
Anyone that is watching television in the state of Wisconsin has probably seen the new John McCain ad on the environment. The ad over-reaches trying to put a happy face on John McCain's record in the Senate. Although the ad tries to paint McCain as a "maverick" on the environment, reality shows that his departures from the Bush party line are rare at best. Conveniently, just after starting the current ad buy, McCain provided us with the latest example of why he is McSame as Bush on the environment.

This week both Bush and McCain pushed an oil industry plan to end the federal ban on offshore drilling. The oil industry is hardly known for its protective policies over the environment. Actually in many ways the most serious environmental issues of our day can, in some way, be laid at their feet. Yet this same oil industry appears to be the policy guide for both Bush and McCain on offshore drilling.

In the Senate John McCain has stood in the way of many pieces of legislation that focused on renewable energies and new solutions. Through his support of the oil industry plan this week, he has made a policy choice that is guaranteed to lead our energy policy into an eventual dead end. We cannot drill our way out of this energy crisis and relying on this kind of backward thinking does little for us long term, but it does do a lot for the oil industry's bottom line.

It is no coincidence that McCain backs up Bush and Big Oil at the same time that he has been raising funds from Texas oil execs. He has raised some $1 million from oil and gas interests already. Further, McCain has at least 22 staffers and fundraisers that have lobbied for Big Oil interests . While there are some Republican leaders that are taking a stand against Big Oil, John McCain is not one of them. He has fallen into line on many issues and offshore drilling is just the latest. No amount of ad buys can change his McSame record on offshore drilling and the environment. [OneWisconsinNow, 6/19/08]

THE BIG IDEA:

— On paper, Susana Martinez makes lots of sense as a potential running mate for the eventual Republican nominee. She's a Latina in a party that struggles with Hispanics and women, a former district attorney in a moment when the public yearns for security and a conservative who got reelected in a blue state last year with 56 percent of the vote.

In practice, the chairman of the Republican Governors Association has become a punch line among some GOP elites in D.C. She's gotten a reputation within corners of the consultant class as Palinesque: gaffe-prone, not intellectually curious, and not up for the rigors of a national campaign.

Making it in Santa Fe is not the same as making it in Washington. New Mexico's population is, after all, just 2.1 million.

— The latest setback for any future aspirations Martinez might have came yesterday when the tape of a police officer's belt recorder was released publicly. The governor sounds intoxicated as she speaks with the cop about a noise complaint in her hotel room and a report that bottles had been thrown from the balcony. The officer then discusses what to do about her with a security guard from the Eldorado Hotel and Spa.

"Honestly, you know, I've only really been working here for like a month and a half," the guard tells the cop in the exchange around 1:30 a.m. the Sunday before last. "So this actually is my first run-in with this sort of thing. … I would never expect the first time to be the governor. I really don't know what to do in this situation because I can tell that she's … kind of …"

"Inebriated," the cop finishes.

"Yes," the guard replied.

The governor's office told local press that it was snowballs, not bottles, thrown from the room. And her office said yesterday that she only had a drink and a half. Apologizing for telling a police dispatcher not to send officers, the governor told the Albuquerque Journal last Friday that she was "absolutely not" drunk during the episode. Listen to the 4-minute audio here.

— Ted Cruz and Marco Rubio, both sons of Cuban immigrants, are obviously in the top tier of the GOP contest. But if the nominee is looking for a Hispanic from the west to join the ticket, Nevada Republican Gov. Brian Sandoval might be a safer bet, especially after this hotel episode. The former federal judge was also easily reelected last year.

— Hillary asks Bernie supporters to join her once she's the nominee. "It's hard for me to believe that anybody who would support Senator Sanders would want to see any of the Republicans elected president of the United States," Clinton said in Iowa last night . "I would just ask that when this nomination is wrapped up that they come and join with us to make sure that we don't turn the White House back over to the Republicans." After incorrectly claiming during Saturday's debate that ISIS shows videos of Trump to lure recruits, Clinton also tweaked her line of attack to say that videos of Trump are being shown on "Arabic television" to incite jihadists. — Shot: Americans support barring Syrian refugees from the U.S., 51 percent to 43 percent, according to Quinnipiac polling released this morning.

Chaser: Thirteen more refugees, mostly children, drowned overnight off the coast of a Greek island while trying to sail in a makeshift boat from Turkey to Europe.

— More from this morning's Q poll: Americans oppose Donald Trump's plan to ban all Muslims from coming to the country by a more than 2:1 margin (66 percent to 27 percent). The partisan divide on the issue, however, is sharp. Democrats would accept Syrian refugees (74-22) while Republicans (82-13) and independents (51-42) would ban them. All three groups oppose barring all Muslims: Dems (79-18); Republicans (51-41) and independents (67-22). A majority (55 percent) of Americans believe domestic extremists are a bigger threat than foreign radicals, while 55 percent think Islam is a peaceful religion. Americans also support (50-42) sending ground troops to fight ISIS.

On other issues: Americans want the next president to fight climate change, 69 to 23 percent, while a narrow majority, 50 to 27 percent, oppose new gun control laws. But a large 89 to 9 percent majority back background checks for purchases at gun shows and online. (Full breakdown here.)

— On the economy, a new Pew survey shows 45 percent of Americans rate the economy as "fair," compared to 27 percent who see it as "excellent" and 28 percent who rate it as "poor." Americans are less optimistic about the economy next year than they were a year ago. Last December, 31 percent believed the economy would improve over the next year. Only 20 percent do right now. While 41 percent say that plenty of jobs exist in their communities, the highest level in eight years, 68 percent of those with incomes of less than $30,000 feel they're falling behind. And 73 percent of total respondents support raising the minimum wage.

— A new CNN/ORC poll continues to show Trump dominating the GOP field: He wins Republican and GOP-leaning voters with 39 percent, with Cruz finishing a distant 2nd with 18 percent (up 2 points since last month). Ben Carson and Marco Rubio lost some traction, both coming in at 10 percent. Trump smashes his competition on who can best handle the economy, illegal immigration and ISIS.

— Squeezing the vice on Vladimir Putin, the Treasury Department barred businesses from dealings with dozens more Russian companies and individuals. It's part of ongoing U.S. sanctions against the Russian energy sector and came one day after the U.N. extended sanctions against Russia for another six months over its illegal invasion of Ukraine. Wonder what Trump thinks… (Steven Mufson)

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

Great deep dive –> "The quiet impact of Obama's Christian faith, " by Greg Jaffe: "President Obama did not grow up in a religious household and became a practicing Christian as an adult. He has written more extensively about his spiritual awakening than almost any other modern president, addressing it in two books before he was elected to the White House and in more than a dozen speeches since. His faith had been central to his identity as a new kind of Democrat who would bring civility to the country's political debates by appealing to Republicans through the shared language of their Judeo-Christian values. With just one year left in his second term, Obama now holds a different distinction: No modern president has had his faith more routinely questioned and disparaged. Recent polls show that 29 percent of Americans and nearly 45 percent of Republicans say he is a Muslim. … Throughout his political career, Obama has described his faith as one that acknowledges doubt and man's inherently sinful nature. 'He has a very stoic and fatalistic view of mankind,' said Sen. Timothy M. Kaine (D-Va.) … For Obama, faith is a means to move from that dire reality — the world as it is — to the promise of the world as it ought to be. This idea of faith as an ennobling struggle runs through virtually all of his most ambitious speeches."

Is Obama too concerned about collateral damage? –> "As bombing in Syria intensifies, a debate about the rules of engagement," by Missy Ryan and Karen DeYoung: "President Obama's order to intensify air attacks in Syria has led to new internal debate over whether to loosen tight restrictions on strikes against Islamic State targets that risk civilian casualties … But so far, at least, the White House has resisted proposals to change the rules of engagement for the bombing. Each strike … is weighed against likely collateral damage and must be individually approved by top officers at the coalition operations center in Baghdad. … In Iraq, local commanders have publicly complained about U.S. reluctance to strike targets in populated areas. According to new figures released by the military Tuesday, about 56 percent of all coalition aircraft return from 'strike missions' without having used their weapons, either because of bad weather or a judgment that the risk of civilian casualties is too high."

Unintended consequences of ethics rules –> "Meet the author of 'The Revenant' — except you can't because of his federal job," by Ben Terris: "When 'The Revenant,' the highly anticipated new film adapted from Michael Punke's book, had its big opening in L.A. — an evening featuring Leonardo DiCaprio, Tom Hardy and Oscar-winning director Alejandro González Iñárritu — the author was nowhere to be seen. He was 10,000 miles away in Nairobi, putting the finishing touches on an international trade agreement enacting a $1.3 trillion trade deal covering GPS devices, semiconductors and touch screens. Punke, 51, may be having the literary moment of a lifetime — more than a decade after his novel was released to high praise but modest sales — but as the deputy U.S. trade representative and ambassador to the World Trade Organization in Switzerland, he's missing out on a lot of the fun. In fact, he wasn't even allowed to talk about 'The Revenant' for this article. Federal ethics rules prohibit him from doing any side work — even a little promotional campaign — that might enrich him and potentially abuse his high-ranking office in the process."

Big investigation exposes troubling gaps –> "For 55 officers involved in fatal shootings this year, it wasn't their first time," by Keith Alexander, Steven Rich, Wesley Lowery, Amy Brittain and Sandhya Somashekhar: "More than 50 police officers involved in fatal shootings this year had previously fired their guns in deadly on-duty shootings. … For a handful of officers, it was their third fatal shooting. For one officer, it was his fourth. The findings concerned many law enforcement experts, who said most officers never fire their weapons on the job. The analysis also exposed another gap in the federal government's oversight of fatal police shootings nationwide: the absence of a system for tracking multiple shootings by individual officers. The 55 officers were identified as part of a Post project tracking all fatal shootings by police in the line of duty in 2015. It is the first nationwide attempt to determine whether fatal police shootings are isolated events in an officer's career or whether some officers repeatedly fire their weapons in deadly encounters. The Post also found that another 45 officers had previously been involved in non-fatal shootings."

— ZIGNAL VISUAL: Cruz was smart to announce first. To parse the Republican race for president in this most unusual campaign year, our analytics partners at Zignal Labs broke the GOP field into two categories: Trump, and everyone else. Today, they look at the most buzzed about moments across social and traditional media in the GOP campaign of 2015. For the non-Trump GOP field, the Texas senator's declaration of his candidacy was the most mentioned day of the campaign thus far. He was the first major candidate out of the gate. And his well-choreographed speech during the convocation at Liberty

The four other biggest moments were:

- Carly Fiorina goes after Planned Parenthood at the debate and then jumps to second behind Trump in poll
- Rand Paul announces his candidacy in Kentucky
- Marco Rubio announces his candidacy in Miami

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

— New York Times, "As TV ad rates soar, 'super PACs' pivot to core campaign work," by Nick Corasaniti and Matt Flegenheimer: "Soaring advertising costs in early primary states are compelling major 'super PACs' to realign their tactics, de-emphasizing costly broadcast commercials in favor of the kind of nuts-and-bolts work that presidential candidates used to handle themselves. They are overseeing extensive field operations, data-collection programs, digital advertising, email lists, opposition research and voter registration efforts. The shift away from the broadcast television buys that had been the groups' main role in past presidential campaigns is among the most significant developments in outside political spending since the Supreme Court's 2010 Citizens United decision. … It is not yet known whether field and data efforts spearheaded by outside groups will be as effective as they are in the hands of a candidate."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— Wall Street Journal, "Sun-soaked states see populations grow, Census Bureau reports," by Janet Adamy and Paul Overberg: "The populations of big Sunbelt states bulged this past year while pockets of the Midwest and Northeast declined, accelerating a migration shift that will help shape who captures the White House in 2016. Census Bureau figures released Tuesday, which tally state-by-state population changes in the 12 months ended July 1, show how key swing states in the 2016 election are growing. Florida, North Carolina, Arizona and Nevada all notched notable gains in population. 'These states were already important in terms of electing the president…it just means they're going to become more important,' said William Frey, a demographer at the Brookings Institution in Washington. … In general, Democrats see a 2016 advantage in the fact that many of these states are gaining minorities who traditionally lean disproportionately toward Democratic candidates. But after 2020, Republicans may benefit because red states, led by Texas, are projected to gain a chunk of electoral votes during the once-a-decade reapportioning of House seats and Electoral College votes."

— Politico, "Solar blowback hits Reid's Nevada, " by Esther Whieldon: "Harry Reid's home state dealt a lethal blow Tuesday to rooftop solar power — the latest skirmish of a nationwide green energy battle that has pitted the Senate Democratic leader against his favorite target, the Koch brothers. The move by Nevada's utility regulator, which voted to slash the economic incentives for homeowners to install solar panels, was most immediately a showdown between billionaires Warren Buffett, owner of the state's largest power company, and Elon Musk, whose SolarCity is the nation's largest installer of panels that create electricity from the sun. But it also served as a proxy fight in a national struggle about states' green energy programs, in which free-market groups backed by industrialists Charles and David Koch have fought to roll back incentives that they argue distort the marketplace and force some customers to subsidize other people's power choices."

— Roll Call, "Boehner-backed candidate bows out of race to replace him ," by Warren Rojas: "Butler County Auditor Roger Reynolds' abrupt withdrawal last week from the 16-way contest to fill the vacancy created by John Boehner's retirement is another sign of how little conservatives think of the former speaker. Reynolds was seen as a favorite among the 14 Republicans in the race and was believed to have Boehner's backing. But that didn't work in Reynolds' favor among some conservatives. 'It is pretty clear that Boehner is behind Roger Reynolds,' Lori Viars, a board member of the Conservative Republican Leadership Committee, told Cincinnati.com in October. And that, she hinted, might not be such a good thing. 'While Boehner is a big fish in Butler County, a lot of conservatives who vote in primaries have not been happy with him,' she warned."

— BuzzFeed, "How earthquake scientists In Missouri stumbled on military blasts in Iraq," by Dan Vergano: "Iraq is girded by a network of 10 seismic monitoring stations that were set up in 2005 following the U.S. invasion, tied to a central facility in Baghdad first erected in the 1970s. Iraqi universities — using U.S. military funding — established these seismic monitors to map small earthquakes and watch for any signs of nuclear tests next door in Iran. But a team of American scientists report that the seismic data also includes a treasure trove of blast signatures in the strife-torn region. Lead scientist Ghassan Aleqabi of Washington University in St. Louis, who helped establish the Iraq network … stumbled on the data after correlating it to news accounts of car bombs and large explosions."

Republican state rep says gun-toting citizens should "help clean our society of these scumbags" after a man shot someone at a mall in Wisconsin. From the Wisconsin State Journal in Madison: "Wisconsin does not have a death penalty law, but with significant practice and careful aim, law-abiding citizens can help clean our society of these scumbags," state Rep. Bob Gannon said in a statement. "Criminals no longer have any fear of our courts or our prisons, so it's time that the citizens of this fine state stand up and fight back."

HOT ON THE RIGHT

Fox Business Network says its next GOP debate could feature as few as six contenders on stage. From the Washington Examiner: "Candidates must qualify for the main debate by placing in the top six of a recent national poll or within the top five in an Iowa or New Hampshire poll, according to the network." CNN reports that there will be an undercard debate that night.

Pfotenhauer: To Avoid Being Vague, Palin Should Be Clear (MSNBC 10/02/10 11:33am)

TAMRON HALL: We saw at the convention, she was able to . . . talk about her life as a hockey mom. And that worked in that setting . . . I want to talk to you about the substantive, having a command of the facts I'm going to play a little of that Katie Couric interview . . . let's play when she was asked about Supreme Court decisions she did not agree with.

[. . .]

HALL: . . . we know how hindsight feels, you think to yourself, why didn't I saw this, I could've said that . . . how do you avoid that? How do you prove she has a command of the facts? A knowledge of where Sen. McCain . . . stands.

PFOTENHAUER: Knowing Sen. McCain's policies . . . is very different from, frankly, several gotcha questions . . . unless you're a Washington attorney, it's difficult to roll Supreme Court decisions trippingly off the tongue . . .

HALL: What about the question about what papers she reads? . . . she was also asked in that same series of interviews about what papers that she would read . . . and she did not give a specific paper . . . what I'm talking about is: can she be vague?

PFOTENHAUER: I think she's at her best when she's clear about, she's clear about who she is and describing the path that needs to be followed moving forward. And frankly, clear about the distinctions between the Obama path and John McCain's path . . . I think that the stronger and more clearer she is, the more persuasive she will be to the American people.

[. . .]

MATTHEWS: I love the new slurs when they arrive, what is an arugula middle class?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: It's a not very real middle class . . .

MATTHEWS: . . . is this the cultural issue that you guys are going to raise tonight? That she's one of "us" and he's not.

HOLTZ-EAKIN: This is about literally connecting with the pressing problems facing America.

MATTHEWS: Do you think these informational questions that Katie Couric's been asking have been fair? . . .

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Every question is fair . . .

MATTHEWS: Are the answers she gave good ones?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: She gave, out of two hours of interviews, some questions and answers that may not have been the best . . .

ANDREA MITCHELL: She was really becoming a drag on this ticket . . . she stopped that bleeding. Now it gets back to the larger issue, which is not a good issue for John McCain. But next week in his next debate [Obama] will have a chance to really address that head on and see whether McCain can frame the economic questions to the advantage of his candidacy because she is no longer as big a problem as she was beginning to become . . . tonight she had answers, they weren't the questions that the moderator asked but she had rehearsed, clearly coached answers and on style points, she may have done herself a lot of good.

FRED THOMPSON: . . . there's more to qualifications than experience and he says prudence that comes from experience. If there's any time in American history we ought to realize, those with the highest intellects and those with the most knowledge . . . we're not being served very well by them. All that experience needs to be leavened a little bit with other qualifications I think are more important nowadays than ever before . . .

TODD: . . . one thing that Governor Palin brings to the ticket is her experience dealing with energy issues. Do you feel like the McCain campaign hasn't highlighted this enough? That she hasn't been used to talk about energy? We havn't seen her in front of a nuclear power plant, we haven't seen her talk about offshore oil drilling . . .

In defense of Governor Palin, it's dramatically different to be on the campaign trail talking about the natural gas pipeline, or her position on pro-life over a nine month period and being thrown into, argueably a much larger scale and issues that she was unaware of. NICOLE WALLACE: Well there's polls and there's pundits and then there's people David . . . this is someone who isn't going to speak as someone who's had a front row seat for the policy debates for the last thirty years. She's someone for whom tax cuts or tax increases aren't just a debate that takes place in the senate, they're not a weapon for Barack Obama to use, or to lie about, frankly in his case.

SHEPERD SMITH: What did he lie about?

WALLACE: Well, he likes to look the American people in the eye, he did it in the debate last Friday, and say he'll cut taxes for 95% f the American people. It's a flat lie. He has voted to raise taxes on people making as little as 42,000 dollars a year.

Tucker Bounds Claims Palin is an "Expert" on Energy; Obama Wants to Raise Taxes (CNN, CNN Newsroom 10/02/08)
TUCKER BOUNDS: I think we're pointing to some very serious points which is we're gonna have a spirited debate tonight about real issues and Joe Biden has shown a propensity, just like his running mate Barack Obama to say whatever is politically expedient, often times not exactly based in truth. Also pointed to a vote that both of those candidates made in support of higher taxes for Americans making just 42,000 year. I think those are important points to make when you consider that these are two candidates that are talking about running to represent the middle class but their records don't actually show they've stood up for the middle class when it counts most – in their paychecks

BOUNDS: I also want to point out that, you know, in the course of an hour or two long interview there are some things that are gonna be said that aren't gonna look as smooth as they should but there certainly based in some firm convictions. And those are convictions that are largely held by a large swathe of voters… she's an expert on energy issues.

TUCKER BOUNDS: Well, I think the Sarah Palin that we've all come to know will show up here tonight and I think what's most important is that these debate settings, unlike an impromptu interview, allow a candidate to talk about their record, allow the candidate to talk about their past and their life experience and how those things translate into the kind of public service that Americans expect and need right now…

BOUNDS: Energy is certainly a complicated issue . She's gonna talk about a variety of complicated issues, she talks about complicated issues, running a state where you manage ten million dollars and oversee thousands of employees and take on those issues that present themselves to voters and residents up there in Alaska, there are a lot of complicated issues…

Hillary Clinton to Jewish donors: I'll be better for Israel than Obama

But the former secretary of state is sending mixed signals on the president's Iran deal.

By Kenneth P. Vogel and Tarini Parti
7/3/15 6:33 AM EDT
Updated 7/3/15 6:33 AM EDT

Hillary Clinton is privately signaling to wealthy Jewish donors that — no matter the result of the Iranian nuclear negotiations — she will be a better friend to Israel than President Barack Obama.

But, even as donors increasingly push Clinton on the subject in private, they have emerged with sometimes widely varying interpretations about whether she would support a prospective deal, according to interviews with more than 10 influential donors and fundraising operatives.

Clinton's private responses in some ways resemble a foreign policy Rorschach test; donors who see a deal as important to world peace have come away thinking that Clinton shares their perspective, but so, too, do donors who oppose any prospective agreement as compromising Israeli security.

Publicly, she's expressed support for the negotiating process, which she secretly initiated during her time as secretary of state, but has also said "no deal is better than a bad deal."

With the talks heading into the home stretch in Vienna, the issue is emerging as an early test for Clinton's presidential campaign. She's already struggling to balance two of her biggest strengths as a candidate — her deep foreign policy track record and her vaunted fundraising ability — and that balance could become even trickier if there's a deal.

"Whatever way you go, there will be some people who won't like it," said Sarah Kovner, a prominent New York donor who is a leading bundler for Clinton's campaign and worked in Bill Clinton's presidential administration. "You can't have everybody with you. You've got to do what you think is right for the country."

The negotiations are of intense interest for some Jewish donors whose political giving is animated by their support for Israel. They're being counted on by Clinton's allies to donate huge sums for a campaign and a pair of supportive super PACs that, taken together, are expected to raise $2 billion or more.

Clinton's campaign rejected any suggestion that she's trying to have it both ways on Iran.

"Her support for the negotiating process and touting support for Israel are not contradictory," said Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill. "A strong deal is good for Israel in her view."

And several people who've heard her address the issue say the fact that different people can come away with such different interpretations is a testament to her nuanced approach to the issue and her skill as a politician, rather than any vacillation on the subject.

"That's just smart politics," said one donor who supports the negotiations and recently talked to her about them. "Because, right now, you have the freedom to say all those things, so why would you commit and box yourself in until you saw what the deal was?"

Clinton recently told another pro-deal donor that she was "very supportive of the negotiating process," the donor recalled, while a third funder said she boasted of her role in starting the talks. "So it seemed like she was supporting it," recalled the funder.

And, at a Manhattan fundraiser last week featuring a largely Jewish group of donors, Clinton defended Obama against charges he had weakened the U.S.-Israel relationship, asserting that such criticism stemmed from a "perception" problem, according to a donor who was present. But she also suggested that if she were elected president she could correct that problem and bring the two nations closer.

"Diplomacy is all about personal relationships, and I've got my own relationships," she said, referencing her two-decade association with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, an ardent opponent of the Iran deal and, occasionally, of Obama. Clinton even cited her rapport with former Israeli ambassador to the U.S. Michael Oren, who last week published a book that was brutally critical of the Obama administration and was timed for release to try to stymie the Iran deal. "I know Michael well, but I haven't read the book," she said.

At a fundraiser last month at the Long Island home of Democratic donor Jay Jacobs, Clinton was asked by an Orthodox rabbi about threats to Israel's security. "She did stress in no uncertain terms her full and fervent support of the state of Israel and the defense of the state of Israel," recalled Jacobs. "And the people in the audience who heard it seemed to be comfortable with her answer."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Likewise, donors at a different New York fundraiser seemed to fully accept her answer to a slightly different question about the U.S. interest in the deal, said billionaire hedge fund manager Marc Lasry, a leading Clinton donor. “She said ‘I’m going to do what’s in the best interest of the U.S.,’ and that was the end of it,” Lasry said.

Dan Berger, a Philadelphia lawyer and major Democratic donor who supports the framework of a deal, cautioned that the interests of the U.S. and Israel, “although close, are not identical. It might not be in the best interest of American Jews, but it’s got to be in the best interest of the majority of the people.” He urged Jewish donors “to take a step back and look at the complexity and judge the agreement based on its merits,” adding: “I’d hope Hillary would judge it based on its merits and not on political support.”

Lasry rejected the suggestion that Clinton would even consider the fundraising implications when assessing any deal.

But Clinton’s senior foreign policy advisers have briefed interested wealthy donors on both the negotiations over the deal and its prospects for congressional approval, according to one donor who recently talked to a top Clinton aide.

“It’s a tricky issue for her,” said the donor who was briefed, arguing that Jewish donors who oppose a deal and favor military intervention in Iran “are going to put her in a box.”

Clinton’s allies are carefully monitoring the sensitivities of a handful of hawkish Democratic mega-donors for signs that the Iran talks may be influencing their willingness to write million-dollar super PAC checks. Chief among that group is billionaire Hollywood entrepreneur Haim Saban, who sources say has spoken multiple times with Clinton and her top aides about the deal.

In April, he strongly suggested that Clinton opposed the deal. “I know where she stands, but I can’t talk about it,” Saban told an Israeli television news channel, adding under questioning, “She has an opinion, a very well-defined opinion. And in any case, everything that she thinks and everything she has done and will do will always be for the good of Israel. We don’t need to worry about this.”

He soon backtracked, saying “I have no idea what Hillary thinks about the Iran deal.”

And multiple prominent Jewish donors who joined Saban at a White House meeting with Obama in April to discuss the Iran negotiations said Saban expressed open-mindedness about supporting the deal, though one participant suggested his opinion shouldn’t hold as much weight as those of foreign policy professionals.

“Haim Saban is a very smart businessman who has a tremendous amount of love for the Clintons, but I don’t think he is the most sophisticated policy analyst that there is,” said the donor.

Saban’s representatives did not respond to questions about his interactions with Clinton.

But on Thursday, POLITICO reported that he donated $2 million this year to a super PAC supporting her presidential campaign, which Democratic finance sources interpreted as a sign that Saban’s financial support will not be conditioned on Clinton taking a certain stance on the Iran deal.

Steve Rabinowitz, a Democratic consultant who worked in the Clinton White House and was a co-founder of Jewish Americans Ready for Hillary, argued that the Iran deal isn't going to be a deciding issue for either donors or voters.

"Do people in my community talk about the Iran deal? Sure. But is it affecting their support for Hillary Clinton? No," he said. "Iran certainly will — and already has — become a talking point, but it will not move three votes or $3."

Clinton has the potential to bring along donors like Saban who might have been skeptical of negotiating with Iran, argued the Long Island donor Jacobs. "Hillary has a lot of credibility and support in the Jewish community. It's broad and deep. People understand that she has fought and has been there as an advocate," he said. "So when she speaks on the issue, there will be more people in the Jewish community who have perhaps unfairly not appreciated President Obama's support who will at least give her view a more open-minded assessment."

If Clinton backs any eventual deal, its proponents will be under pressure to step up their giving — both to the Clinton super PACs and to pro-deal groups — because she is likely to come under heavy fire from deep-pocketed groups that oppose the deal.

"If there's a deal, and she comes out in favor of it, you can be sure there will be a great deal of fire trained on her," said Noah Pollak, the executive director of the Emergency Committee for Israel. The conservative group has worked to rally opposition to the talks and this week began airing an ad pressuring New York Democratic Sen. Chuck Schumer, who is considered a key vote on the deal, to oppose it.

The left-leaning Israel advocacy group J Street, which has worked to build support for the deal, is expected to come to the defense of supporters, including potentially Clinton, though on some issues, the group's members regard her as too hawkish for their tastes.

"For people who speak on these Middle East issues on which we have strong positions, we come to their support and defense on those issues, regardless of party, regardless of candidacy," said Victor A Kovner, a Democratic donor who chairs J Street's PAC.

Kovner, like his wife, Sarah Kovner, is backing Clinton, and said he has communicated his support for a deal to the candidate.

"She is familiar with my view, but she has a lot of supporters and advisers on both sides of this question — around the nation, both within the Jewish community and beyond the Jewish community."

Q 1) General Petraeus -- I served with him. Tells story about Petraeus and what a great man he is.

MCCAIN: Thank you for serving. I am honored. It's just hard to understand why Obama would not vote to condemn an ad by an organization that questions the patriotism of such a great man as Petraeus.

Q 2) Hillary Clinton -- you mentioned Obama, but not her. Taxes on phone bills -- the tax that was originally intended to pay for the Spanish-American war. Also, sales taxes from the mall don't stay in the communities.

MCCAIN: I'll be glad to look into that. By the way, there's many individuals who want to tax the Internet. Don't let them do it.

Follow-up: Character issue. Like you I was opposed to gay marriage -- I agree with civil unions. Infidelity is a terrible cancer on this country. I think if we are going to talk about gay marriage, we also need to talk about the preservation of marriage.

MCCAIN: I respect her, I admire her. We have stark differences. I respect the campaign that she has run. I believe in the sanctity and unique status of marriage as between man and a woman (cheers and small boos).

Q 3) Iranian threat. What would be your response to Iran if they were to bomb Israel? And how would you fund faith based organizations.

MCCAIN: I think faith-based organizations are great entities.
I will never allow a second Holocaust. I believe there are many measures we can use to thwart Iran before taking any military action.

Q 4) Tax cuts -- we need tax cuts and spending cuts. Reads statement about Bush tax cuts and how McCain in 2001 and 2003 said he was opposed to the tax cuts because they gave breaks to the wealthy. As president, what kind of tax cuts that you do propose? Do you have your own thoughts or are you simply trying to make the Bush tax cuts permanent?

MCCAIN: If you do not make the Bush tax cuts permanent -- you will essentially raising taxes for everyone. At the time, I had my own spending-cut package in Congress. We need to control spending -- I favor further tax cuts. You can't dispute cutting the capital gains tax. Obama wants to raise the capital gains tax.

Follow-up: Those tax cuts are distributed to the wealthy. Are you looking to do that different than what you said in 2001?

MCCAIN: We're talking a lot of people. The capital gains taxes affects more than just wealthy people -- 100 million Americans report capital gains taxes on their income. I favor further tax cuts. But first we have to get spending under control.

Q 5) Military member -- Iraq, good news coming out. Military is strapped thin however. What will you do?

MCCAIN: I think you are right. The army and the marine core are smaller now. One of the mistakes that we made is not to increase the size of the military. I will do whatever it takes to increase the size of the military.

Q 6) Military member - Only Republican in whole family. I like you. "I'm the only one in my family that likes you." I wanted to know if I can get a picture with you.

MCCAIN: I'd be honored. Tell the members of your family that you're the smartest member.

Q 7) Have you chosen your VP?

MCCAIN: No.

Follow-up: Can I make a suggest?

MCCAIN: Sure.

QUESTIONER: Our good friend, Fred Thompson.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q 8) Freedom from religion. This country was founded on faith and God. What or who is the supreme authority in your life and how will it be evident in your presidency?

MCCAIN: I think the experience I had here and faraway, the only reason I am here today is because of my faith. I believe I am here because I got one more day, one more hour, one more minute.
Tells story from POW experience. We were used as propaganda. One of those methods was to use rope to tie your arms back. One night I was in that situation. A guy walked in -- a gun guard -- he loosened the ropes that were holding me. He came at the end of his shift and tightened them again. On Christmas day, I was let out to walk outside, the guard drew a cross on the ground. That's the one person I always wanted to see again.

Q 9) Iraq war veteran and a poet. I understand you are one of those Senators who did not read all of the intelligence report leading up to the invasion of Iraq. Can you tell me who the poet laureate of Arizona is?

MCCAIN: I do not know. You wanna tell me?

Questioner: That's all I needed to know.

MCCAIN: I was briefed many, many times. And everything showed that Saddam had WMD's.

Follow-up: Inspirational authors to you?

MCCAIN: Joel Austeen. Ernest Hemingway -- because of serving a cause greater than ourselves. History. I could go on and on. I read all the time.

Q 10) Social conservatives are worried about your background on this. Who will you appoint to the Supreme Court? And how will you combat judicial activism?

MCCAIN: Standard judiciary answer. I'd appoint people like Alito and Roberts. Appointing judges is one of the most important jobs of the President. In all candor, guys who know that very fact are Thomspon and Frist.

Q 11) Thank you for your character. Thank you for your service. What is your stand on immigration? And will you autograph my book?

MCCAIN: I think the people that inspire me are our founding fathers.
I believe that are founding fathers in their writings and the most noble words they've written -- we're all created equal ....

Q 12) Health care. My aunt is 92 and suffers from chronic pain. A big problem these days are doctors are being prosecuted by the federal government for aggressively prescribing pain medication. I want you to stop the persecution and reverse this trend/policy.

MCCAIN: Trials are not brought without evidence. But we're lucky, we have Bill Frist here -- what do you think Bill?

FRIST: Chronic disease has to be the focus of health care policy. It was one of the biggest problems. We must continue to invest in science so we can help solve your problem.

Follow-up: Many doctors are afraid to be aggressive because of the prosecutions that are happening.

MCCAIN: I will look into it. And do everything I can if there are abuses.

Q 13) Thank you for your service. I served as a nurse. NARF -- about health care policy? There needs to be more doctors that specialize in the treatment of seniors.

MCCAIN: I'll look into it.

Hey John --

As someone who has been in Washington for 33 years, John McCain has had to make a lot of decisions. So when McCain named his best decision yet, we figured it would be about helping Arizona families.

But instead McCain said it was...Sarah Palin.

John McCain: Choosing Sarah Palin In 2008 'The Best Decision I've Ever Made' - Huffington Post

- Yes, Sarah Palin who tried to boost her foreign policy credentials by saying she could see Russia from Alaska.
- The same Sarah Palin who denies man-made climate change and suggests evolution isn't real.
- And the same Sarah Palin who just endorsed Donald Trump.

It's not surprising. McCain, Palin, and Trump have all built political careers on getting soundbites and TV show appearances rather than results. Trump's a reality TV star turned politician, Palin's a politician turned reality TV star, and McCain's the most prolific Sunday talk show TV pundit in DC.

The best decision Arizona families could make is clear: elect Ann Kirkpatrick and retire John McCain. Ann will make sure Arizona families can find work, have health care, and are safe from national security threats.

John McCain is more vulnerable than ever and "Senator Kirkpatrick" could soon be a reality. National Journal and Politico have ranked our race as one of the top Senate races.

But here's the problem -- we're critically short of our $30,000 January goal and don't have a lot of time to make up ground. Help us out with a contribution of $5 or more.

Let's get to work,

Team Kirkpatrick

Save the Children's Insurance (NYT)
By Hillary Rodham Clinton and Bill Frist
February 12, 2015
The New York Times

NO child in America should be denied the chance to see a doctor when he or she needs one — but if Congress doesn't act soon, that's exactly what might happen.

For the past 18 years, the Children's Health Insurance Program has provided much-needed coverage to millions of American children. And yet, despite strong bipartisan support, we are concerned that gridlock in Washington and unrelated disputes over the Affordable Care Act could prevent an extension of the program. As parents, grandparents and former legislators, we believe that partisan politics should never stand between our kids and quality health care.

We may be from different political parties, but both of us have dedicated our careers to supporting the health of children and their families. This shared commitment inspired us to work together in the late 1990s to help create CHIP to address the needs of the two million children whose families make too much money to be covered by Medicaid, but cannot afford private insurance.

The resulting program, a compromise between Republicans and Democrats, disburses money to the states but gives them flexibility to tailor how they provide coverage to meet the needs of their own children and families. Some expanded Medicaid; others created separate programs. As a result, the number of uninsured children in America has dropped by half. Children miss less school because of illness or injury, and we've seen a significant decline in childhood mortality.

Today, state governments continue to rely on the program to meet crucial health and budget priorities. It's not surprising that every single governor who responded to a 2014 survey — 39 in all — supported saving CHIP.

Of course, the American health care landscape has changed significantly since CHIP started. Under the Affordable Care Act, many families with children are now receiving financial help to enroll in private health coverage through the new health insurance marketplace. But while it is possible that private, family-wide policies offered by employers and marketplaces may one day render CHIP unnecessary, for now substantial gaps still exist — and too many children can still fall through them.

One specific provision of the Affordable Care Act, often called the "family glitch," has been interpreted to prevent many families from receiving subsidized health coverage in the new marketplace if one parent is offered "affordable coverage" through his or her job. In this case, "affordable" is defined as less than roughly 9.5 percent of household income for that parent to sign up alone — even though the actual cost of available family coverage is far higher. For families affected by this glitch, CHIP may be the only affordable option for making sure their children are covered.

We already know what happens when CHIP is no longer an option for families. According to a recent report from the Georgetown University Health Policy Institute, as many as 14,000 children in Arizona lost their health insurance after 2010, when it became the only state to drop CHIP.

We don't want to see the same thing happen across the country. If CHIP is not reauthorized, more families will be hit with higher costs. As many as two million children could lose coverage altogether. Millions more will have fewer health care benefits and much higher out-of-pocket costs, threatening access to needed health services. And because families without adequate insurance often miss out on preventive care and instead receive more expensive treatment in hospital emergency rooms, all of us will be likely to end up paying part of the bill.

While reauthorization is not due until the end of September, Congress needs to act now. With more than four-fifths of state legislatures adjourning by the end of June, lack of action and clarity from Washington by then will make budgeting and planning virtually impossible.

Reauthorizing CHIP for the next four years would cost about $10 billion — an investment in our children that will pay off for decades to come. This is an opportunity to send a message that Washington is still capable of making common-sense progress for American families.

As 2015 unfolds, we know Congress will continue to debate the future of health care reform. We most likely won't see eye to eye about some of the more contentious questions. But one thing everyone should be able to agree on is that our most vulnerable children shouldn't be caught in the crossfire.

This isn't about politics. It's about our kids and our nation's future. What could be more important than that?

Hillary calls for extending CHIP funding (The Hill)
By Jesse Byrnes
February 12, 2015
The Hill

Hillary Clinton is pushing for Congress to reauthorize the federal government's child healthcare program, lending her support to congressional Democrats looking to keep the program around.

"[D]espite strong bipartisan support, we are concerned that gridlock in Washington and unrelated disputes over the Affordable Care Act could prevent an extension of the program," Clinton and former GOP Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) wrote in an op-ed in The New York Times on Thursday.

"As parents, grandparents and former legislators, we believe that partisan politics should never stand between our kids and quality health care," the pair added.
Clinton, the presumed 2016 Democratic presidential frontrunner, is calling on Congress to extend the Children's Health Insurance Program's (CHIP) funding for the next four years, labeling the approximately $10 billion expense "an investment in our children that will pay off for decades to come."

Senate Democrats have launched their own push to reauthorize the program, signing on as co-sponsors of a bill that would extend funding through 2019. Currently, the program's funding runs out at the end of September. A companion bill was also introduced in the House on Thursday.

The program, which has been around for the better part of two decades, covers about 10 million children. Some Republicans have cast CHIP as duplicative given benefits under ObamaCare, and say additional subsidies and eligibility under Medicaid make the program as unnecessary.

"If CHIP is not reauthorized, more families will be hit with higher costs. As many as two million children could lose coverage altogether. Millions more will have fewer health care benefits and much higher out-of-pocket costs, threatening access to needed health services," Clinton and Frist wrote.

"And because families without adequate insurance often miss out on preventive care and instead receive more expensive treatment in hospital emergency rooms, all of us will be likely to end up paying part of the bill," they added.

The op-ed also marks the second time in as many weeks that Clinton has jumped into a healthcare debate. Last week she tweeted that "#vaccineswork" after two possible 2016 Republican contenders, Gov. Chris Christie (N.J.) and Sen. Rand Paul (Ky.) suggested that parents should have some choice on whether to immunize their children.

Clinton Consults Experts to Chart Foreign-Policy Agenda (WSJ)
By Peter Nicholas
February 13, 2015
The Wall Street Jounral

Voters aren't seeing much of Hillary Clinton these days, leading some Democrats to wonder when their front-runner will enter the 2016 contest. Behind the scenes, she is prepping carefully for the race of her life.

Private meetings that she's held with various foreign-policy experts offer some hints as to how she might part ways with President Barack Obama when it comes to crises in Ukraine, Syria and other global trouble spots. The major takeaway from these private talks is that she wants a strategy more suited to shaping conditions overseas, as opposed to reacting to events as they arise, people familiar with the meetings said.

In these meetings, Mrs. Clinton's habit is to go a round the room, asking questions and taking notes with pad and pen in hand. She has been looking for an analysis of current conditions and possible solutions – but also a more proactive posture, some familiar with the meetings say.

Mr. Obama has seemed flat-footed at times in response to the Islamic State's advances in Syria and Russian President Vladimir Putin's aggressive moves to gain territory in Ukraine.

"There's a degree of concern that what we're doing oftentimes looks to be reactive in response to what the problem of the moment is — as opposed to what is the strategic approach and what might we be doing differently," said one person familiar with her thinking who requested anonymity.

As Secretary of State during Mr. Obama's first term, Mrs. Clinton played the role of loyal adviser in a foreign-policy apparatus that was run out of the White House; Mr. Obama was the one making the decisions.

It seems clear that if Mrs. Clinton wins the White House she would chart a different path than the one charted during the Obama administration.

In her 2014 book, "Hard Choices," and in various speeches, Mrs. Clinton suggested she would have been more interventionist in Syria in 2012–more willing than the president to arm moderate rebels in hopes of stopping the civil war. She has been unsparing in her criticism of Mr. Putin, likening territorial grabs in Ukraine to Adolph Hitler's aggression before World War II.

"She's much less risk-averse" than Mr. Obama, said Aaron David Miller, vice president of the Woodrow Wilson Center for Scholars who has taken part in Mrs. Clinton's foreign-policy briefings.

If she becomes president, Mrs. Clinton might have some latitude to pursue a more activist foreign policy. Context is everything.

Mr. Obama took office at a time when the nation was weary of the Iraq war. His caution suited an electorate that was skeptical of new military engagements. But after eight years of Mr. Obama, the public might be ready for a president who favors a more muscular approach, Mr. Miller said.

A Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll last month showed that 56% disapproved of the president's handling of foreign policy, compared to just 37% who favored the job he's doing.

"If she becomes president, her political space on foreign policy will be a reaction to what has been criticized by many as an over-course correction [by Mr. Obama]," Mr. Miller said. "She'll have an easier time of it, I think, than Obama had in this direction."

Hillary Clinton should jump in now (WAPO)
By James Downie
February 12, 2015
The Washington Post

If she runs, Hillary Clinton will be the Democratic nominee in 2016. Everyone knows this. Even accounting for the unreliability of early polls, her current lead over the rest of the field (between 40 percent and 60 percentage points) dwarfs her 10 point to 20 point lead over then-Senator Barack Obama at this stage eight years ago. All that is left for her to do is formally enter the race. So why hasn't she?

Some of those who think Clinton should wait make two arguments in Thursday's Wall Street Journal: Waiting to announce lets the media focus on Republicans fighting each other, and it saves money on campaign operations. (There is a third argument that others make privately: Announcing now prolongs the period when Clinton is under even more scrutiny, having to take stances on every issue while avoiding "gaffes." But Clinton is hardly silent right now, and if Democrats are truly fearful that Clinton could seriously hurt her chances in the next few months, they should probably be looking harder for another candidate.)

Clinton should want the media to focus on her would-be GOP opponents clawing at each other, but, as the Iowa caucuses get closer, Republican candidates will only get nastier toward each other. At the moment, with the exception of Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), the GOP candidates are still playing nice. That comity will not last. If Clinton waits until "between April and July," which the Journal reported is the most likely date, her announcement may not just take media attention away from Paul's tweeting, but from some more serious internal GOP fighting.

As for the expense of starting the campaign earlier, it is true that (at least according to former top adviser Mark Penn) Clinton's 2008 campaign managed to blow through most of the money it raised in its first year. But the proper response to the fear of repeating those errors is not to delay the campaign, but to learn from the mistakes in 2008 and from veterans of the Obama campaign, which somehow managed not to spend as foolishly. And without serious opposition, the costs for this primary will inevitably be lower.

Instead, by not setting up an official campaign, Clinton has left a vacuum that various super PACs have struggled to fill. These groups haven't been able to raise the money they were hoping to (precisely because Clinton has delayed her entrance), and at the same time various Democratic insiders are fighting with each other for influence over Clinton. This has meant that, somehow, the prohibitive favorite for the Democratic nomination has managed to have a week of negative headlines.

Some might say the costs of delaying are overblown. But they are eerily similar to the strife and indecision that sank Clinton last time. As Joshua Green reported in 2008, in what is still the best post-mortem of that Clinton campaign, "Her advisers couldn't execute strategy; they routinely attacked and undermined each other, and Clinton never forced a resolution. Major decisions would be put off for weeks until suddenly she would erupt, driving her staff to panic and misfire. … What is clear from the internal documents is that Clinton's loss derived not from any specific decision she made but rather from the preponderance of the many she did not make. Her hesitancy and habit of avoiding hard choices exacted a price that eventually sank her chances at the presidency." Sound familiar?

Clinton can avoid those mistakes this time by announcing in the next few weeks, setting up a campaign apparatus above the overlapping super PACs and committing to specific advisers. The longer she stays out, the more one has to wonder if she has truly learned from the errors of eight years ago.

Hillary Clinton Waits ... And Waits ... And Waits (HuffPo)

By Sam Stein

February 12, 2015

The Huffington Post

WASHINGTON -- The continued volatility of the Republican presidential field, and the sheer tameness of the Democratic one, have convinced prominent backers and donors for Hillary Clinton that she should take her time before announcing her candidacy.

In late January, Politico reported that Clinton was thinking of delaying the launch of her campaign from April until July. The move reflected both a lack of a sense of urgency to enter the race and a worry that jumping into the electoral fray might sully Clinton's standing with the public. The idea was received coolly in the press, which noted that staying away from the campaign trail is an odd strategy for winning a campaign.

For those cheering Clinton on, however, the downsides appear incredibly limited. They counter that the media's criticism is mainly a product of its self-interest, which would be served by Clinton announcing a presidential bid.

"She is in the catbird seat," Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) told The Huffington Post in an interview last week. "If she wants time to figure out her strategy, figure out her issues, figure out who her inner staff should be, she is in no hurry. There is no hurry that she has to announce."

A spokesperson for the former secretary of state declined to comment on the timing of a possible presidential run. However, HuffPost spoke with several donors who said they suspect there is no rush on her part, based on the fairly informal outreach they've received to this point (as opposed to harder pitches to get involved). One high-profile donor said last week that while he was previously convinced that Clinton would announce in early February, he now is getting "a completely different vibe" -- though he noted he didn't get this impression directly from conversations with the Clintons themselves.

In the time between that discussion and the publication of this story, the pros and cons of a delayed announcement have become clearer. As far as advantages go, the Democrats most likely to challenge Clinton in the primary have neither hit the ground running (former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb's next scheduled Iowa stop, for instance, is in April) nor shown particularly sharp fangs. Even those who seem most committed to the race don't appear especially interested in attacking Clinton too hard.

Presidential hopeful Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) told MSNBC this week that a matchup between him and Clinton would be "a real clash of ideas." But the clash won't involve negative advertising, should it get to that point. Sanders, according to his longtime adviser Tad Devine, has never run those type of spots and has no plans to do so in the future.

"He never has and he won't," Devine told HuffPost this week. "As the guy who made his ads, I know."

But even as Clinton remains relatively inoculated from attacks from outside her universe, internally, things aren't going so smoothly. This week, a spat between leading operatives running pro-Clinton political action committees spilled out into the open, resulting in an acrimonious split and an awkward reconciliation. Of course, that type of drama -- which comes with having a network of big-name advisers and fundraisers built over several decades -- is likely to happen to Clinton whether or not she's a declared candidate. And certainly, the case could be made that she's best served by not being too close to that type of political muck.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Still, this week's events indicate that the internal squabbling and Clinton's longer-than-expected timeframe are hurting the outside financial infrastructure that was supposed to be in place by the time she announced. And with conservative outside groups flexing their financial muscle -- the billionaire Koch brothers have announced that they plan to spend $889 million in the 2016 election -- some Democrats are openly nervous.

"It is frightening for two people to have such disproportionate influence," Schumer said. His concerns would be lessened, he added, if the Kochs were more willing to funnel money to their legislative causes than to their favored political party. The senator said that he had reached out to the billionaire brothers during the Senate fight over immigration, hoping to convince them to spend money to support the bill. But the Kochs balked, even though they are nominally supportive of immigration reform. "Ninety percent of their ads don't talk about their philosophy," Schumer said. "So this idea that they believe in the free market and reducing regulations, they don't talk about that in their ads!"

In the end, while money may be a problem in 2016 for Democrats in general, it won't be an issue for Clinton specifically. One longtime Clinton donor, Dennis Mehiel, told HuffPost last week that he wasn't worried about Clinton raising funds, or for that matter, getting into the race later in the process. He argued that the dynamics were different in the Democratic field than in the much more crowded Republican one, making it more plausible to wait on Clinton.

"You have this big donors base out there that [Mitt] Romney built," Mehiel said. "If he isn't in the race, there is a scramble for those people. Jeb Bush can't wait months because people will get claimed."

"I'm not sure the donor base for the Clintons is going anywhere until they hear from Hillary," he added. "If she wants to announce in July instead of February, it doesn't change my calculus."

London mayor finds U.S. campaign system 'peculiar' (WAPO)
By Mary Jordan
February 12, 2015
The Washington Post

"Peculiar": that's how Boris Johnson the outspoken mayor of London describes how long it takes to run a presidential campaign in the United States.

In fact, Johnson, often cited as a possible future prime minister, said the advantages of the compact six-week parliamentary election system in Britain came up in his meeting Wednesday with Hillary Clinton, who is already raising millions, hiring operatives and been declared the Democratic front runner for an election 21 months away.

Johnson said Clinton lamented the "protracted system" here and noted the "attraction of having a short, sharp parliamentary election" that decides British leaders. "I am inclined to sympathize with her," the London mayor said. The nearly two year-long campaign on this side of the Atlantic "puts such an emphasis on raising money," he said, and does "seem peculiar to those of us on the outside."

Johnson spoke by phone just as he arrived by Amtrak in Washington, the next stop on his six-day trip to the East Coast, and headed over to Capitol Hill to meet with House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy and the British American caucus.

The stated purpose of Johnson's trip is to stir up British business, though the British press has focused on its usefulness in burnishing his credentials as a player on the global stage. Johnson said he did speak about the Islamic State and Iraq with Clinton. He said the former secretary of state told him she thought that Europe and Britain "needed to toughen up its response to Putin." Meanwhile, a parade of presidential contenders, including Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, have been back in Johnson's home city of London fielding, or ducking, questions about foreign policy.

In Washington, Johnson will speak at Brookings Institution, and Bruce Katz, the founding director of the Metropolitan Policy Program, said the conversation with the London mayor will be on global trade and cities building tech and medical hubs, rather than "what people usual talk to him about: 'Is he going to be prime minister?'"

Katz likened Johnson to Fiorello LaGuardia, New York's larger-than life mayor in the 1930s. "He's a performer as well as a politician," he said.

Johnson will also swing by the Smithsonian National Air and Space Museum to bring fresh attention to the recent announcement that the Smithsonian plans to open its first international exhibition space in London. The proposed 40,000 square feet complex would open in 2021 and be on the site of the 2012 Olympics

With the bestselling erotic novel, "Fifty Shades of Grey," which was written by a British author, hitting the movie screens this week, the mayor took questions about it and said that he couldn't really get through it, "I am ashamed to say." The Telegraph quoted him calling the book "terrible bilge," adding that, despite several attempts to read it, he found that it never started "hotting up." Nonetheless, the mayor called the work "a brilliant British export."

Biden in Iowa: Is he there to talk about colleges or caucuses? (WAPO)
By Katie Zezima
February 12, 2015
The Washington Post

Vice President Biden is in Iowa Thursday - but why?

To tout the community college plan President Obama outlined in the State of the Union, of course. Oh, and mention potential presidential candidates in 2016.

Policies embraced by the presidential candidates in the other party, Biden said, as well as Democrats and others running for office in the next two years, will determine the next 10 to 15 years of the lives of the students he addressed at Drake University in Des Moines.

Biden has run for president twice before, and he has said that he's considering a third crack at the nomination. But his trip comes as Hillary Rodham Clinton is ramping up her staffing and cementing herself as the only dominant Democrat in the race.

He chuckled when asked if he is considering challenging her. "Yes,there's a chance," he said.

Biden has been engrossed in world affairs of late, attending the Munich Security Conference last weekend, where talk pivoted around Ukraine and the possibility of a peace deal that was announced Thursday.

According to CNN, Biden told a group of former campaign staffers and Iowa-based friends that he was coming to the state. So could he be planting the idea that the third campaign could be the charm?

If so there are no outward signs, meanwhile, Clinton has so far done a pretty good job of pilfering West Wing talent. White House counselor John Podesta and communications director Jennifer Palmieri are heading to Clinton's budding campaign.

Biden talked up the community college, but not after talking at length about Iowa politicians. He said his trip reminded him of "what it used be like," when Republicans and Democrats could be friends and work together. Biden said Gov. Terry Branstad, a Republican, greeted him at the airport and came on his plane and lauded former senator Tom Harkin (D).

Biden is also participating in a roundtable discussion at Des Moines Area Community College's Ankeny Campus.

But at least one high-profile Iowa politician wants Biden to mix business with a bit of other, well, business. "When Vice President Biden comes to Des Moines this Thursday, I'm going to ask him to get in," Branstad said. He said he is bored by "what looks like a coronation for Clinton."

But when it comes to Democratic voters who said they also had Clinton fatigue, none mention Biden as a possible contender.

Biden says 2016 should be debate about continuing Obama's policies (Reuters)
By Kay Henderson
February 12, 2015
Reuters

DES MOINES, Feb 12 (Reuters) - Vice President Joe Biden was vague on Thursday about whether he would seek to succeed President Barack Obama, but said the 2016 White House campaign should be centered on whether to continue Obama's policies.

With Hillary Clinton the overwhelming favorite for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016, Biden has made no apparent move toward launching a campaign. On a visit to Iowa, the state that holds the first nominating contest early next year, he said a decision is months away.

"That's a family personal decision that I'm going to make sometime at the end of the summer," Biden told reporters.

Biden, as the sitting vice president, would typically be next in line for the nomination for his party. But the strength and appeal of former Secretary of State Clinton, wife of former President Bill Clinton, has put Biden on the sidelines.

In remarks at Drake University, Biden said the next campaign should be about Obama's economic policies, which he said are working.

"I call it sticking with what works," Biden said, "and what we ought to do." He chastised fellow Democrats who he said have tried to distance themselves from Obama administration policies.

"In my view those seeking to lead the nation should protect and defend and run, yes, run on what we've done, own what we have done, stand for what we have done, acknowledge what we have done and be judged on what (we have) done if we have any chance of a resurgence in 2016," Biden said.

The Republican National Committee quickly picked up on Biden's remarks and said it bolstered their argument that the next Democratic nominee will be campaigning to serve Obama's "third term."

Biden: I'll make a 2016 decision 'at the end of the summer' (WAPO)
By Rebecca Sinderbrand
February 13, 2015
The Washington Post

Vice President Joe Biden said Thursday that his 2016 decision is still months away.

"That's a family personal decision that I'm going to make sometime at the end of the summer," he told reporters in Iowa, when asked about the possibility of another presidential bid.

As former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton and several of her underdog Democratic challengers have begun gearing up for White House runs with staff hires and long-range campaign planning, Biden has so far stayed on the sidelines.

The vice president said Thursday that he was still not actively developing a campaign apparatus in the first-in-the-nation caucus state.

"I've been here a lot, I have a lot of friends," he told reporters in Des Moines. "I'm going to see some of my friends [who] are still in the legislature, and they're here today. But no, I'm not doing any organization, if that's what you mean."

But Biden suggested last month that despite his lack of activity on the infrastructure front, it was too soon to rule him out of contention. He could decide to challenge presumptive candidate and front-runner Clinton, he said then — a prospect that's considered highly remote.

"Yes, there's a chance," he laughed when asked by ABC's George Stephanopoulos if he would challenge Clinton. "But I haven't made my mind up about that. We've got a lot of work to do between now and then."

He added that he wasn't thrown by Clinton's early 2016 moves.

"Secretary Clinton is a really competent person and a friend. The person who is going to be the next president of the United States is the one who is going to be able to articulate the clearest vision to the American people of where they're going to take the country," he said, telling ABC that he didn't think it was necessary to make up his mind about the race "until the summer."

"I think this is wide open on both sides," he said.

On Thursday, during his Iowa appearance to plug the administration's higher education policies, he offered a possible rationale for a run: The next election, he said, would be a fight to preserve the Obama administration's record. "Some say that would amount to the third term for the president. I call it sticking with what works," he said.

Iowa Republicans are embracing Joe Biden to troll Hillary Clinton (Business Insider)

By Colin Campbell

February 12, 2015

Business Insider

Republicans are mocking Hillary Clinton's absence from the 2016 campaign trail by rolling out the red carpet for Vice President Joe Biden.

Biden, who hasn't ruled out running for president next year, visited Iowa on Thursday for two events on college campuses. The state's GOP reacted to the news by gleefully noting it's been some time since Clinton, the Democratic front-runner, dropped by the key presidential primary state.

"We welcome Vice President Biden to Iowa and are glad he is here to give Iowa voters the time and consideration they deserve," the party's chairman, Jeff Kaufmann, said in a statement.

Meanwhile, co-chair Cody Hoefert accused Clinton of expecting a "coronation" despite coming in third place in Iowa when she last ran for president in 2008.

"Say what you will about Vice President Biden, but at least he's here," Hoefert said. "While the Republican Party prepares for one of the most vibrant nomination contests in memory, the Democrats are frozen in place waiting for Hillary Clinton's coronation. Hillary has never had a warm relationship with Iowa voters, and it's clear she doesn't care much to fix it now. I'm confident Iowa voters will remember this in 2016."

Clinton's team insists she will fight hard for the state's votes if she launches a bid for the White House. Her campaign is widely viewed as all but certain and polls show she is well ahead of any potential rivals.

"If she runs, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote," Clinton's spokesman Nick Merrill told The Des Moines Register. "Anyone who thinks otherwise should think again."

However, Clinton has had almost no public appearances or media interviews so far this year. In January, she notably held two events but they were paid speaking engagements in Canada. (Clinton has been fiercely criticized for taking sums as high as $300,000 in speaking fees.)

The national Republican Party also recently mocked Clinton for her lack of public events. The party bought a "Hillary's Hiding" billboard in Iowa on Wednesday and even released a fake movie trailer the next day noting she launched her 2008 campaign much earlier:

Who's going to win Iowa and N.H.? Introducing the POLITICO Caucus (Politico)
By James Hohmann
February 13, 2015
Politico

Most Iowa insiders believe Scott Walker would win their state's caucuses if they were this week.

But they're not this week, and virtually none of the most influential thought leaders in the Hawkeye State believe that the Wisconsin governor will sustain his recent bounce in polls.

This is one of several intriguing findings in the debut survey of The POLITICO Caucus. More than 100 of the most plugged-in activists, operatives and elected officials in Iowa and New Hampshire have agreed to answer a weekly survey over the next year, which will be published here every Friday. It's a diverse mix of powerful figures from across the political spectrum, including party chairmen, members of Congress, radio hosts and rising stars who command loyal followings.

The insiders are immersed in the nomination battles and their views could be a leading indicator of where the polls are heading. The vast majority of those who are participating are not committed to a candidate yet, though some are playing key roles on the burgeoning campaigns.

The consensus across this group is that Hillary Clinton is almost guaranteed to become the Democratic nominee. Only four of 70 who answered guessed that a Democrat other than Clinton will ultimately win their state.

But there's widespread agreement that the GOP field really is wide open. In New Hampshire, the feeling is that Jeb Bush would win the first-in-the-nation primary if it was this week but that it's premature to call him a frontrunner.

Six in 10 Iowa insiders surveyed believe Walker would win the caucuses if they were this week. But only two of the 32 Iowans who returned questionnaires believe the Wisconsin governor will ultimately prevail. "He will now go through a scrutiny that will determine how prepared he is to sustain this frontrunner status," one Iowa Republican remarked.

Here are the key takeaways from our first weekly survey:

Jeb Bush and Scott Walker are fighting for frontrunner status. But neither has it.

Most Republican insiders answered "no" when asked if there's a GOP frontrunner. The field is stronger than in 2012, and any one from a handful of candidates could emerge as the nominee, they believe.

Walker got a big boost from his breakout speech at an event put on last month by Iowa Rep. Steve King in Des Moines. But the insiders are keenly aware he remains untested outside Wisconsin.

Bush is a bigger media draw, enjoys higher name ID and has access to more money than any other GOP candidate. For these reasons, one New Hampshire Republican said he is the frontrunner "simply by default."

Others on the right argued that none of these advantages is enough to make Bush a "real" frontrunner the way that Mitt Romney was at this stage in 2012. "It's too early," said one of the GOP respondents from New Hampshire. "There's a lot of kicking of tires yet to happen."

An Iowa Republican remarked, "This is the most wide open contest I have ever seen."

The world matters. At least, a surprisingly high number of insiders think 2016 will be a national security election.

Roughly half of those interviewed identified the economy – from stagnant wages to income inequality – as the defining issue of 2016. The next-most cited issue was foreign policy and/or national security, with about a quarter of those surveyed predicting it will drive the debate.

Several insiders mentioned specifically the Islamic State and the Levant, or ISIL.

A nonpartisan academic from Iowa said the use of force directive introduced to Congress by President Barack Obama "automatically moves foreign affairs up on this list for 2016."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton, as the former Secretary of State, will likely position herself as the candidate with unrivaled foreign policy chops. Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, who looks increasingly serious about running, is playing up his roles on the Senate intelligence and foreign relations committees.

Rand Paul is winning the GOP ground war. So far.

Hillary Clinton has a built-in, years-in-the-making campaign organization that insiders from both parties agreed is unrivaled. Her 2008 supporters are still with her, and many Obama hands are ready to get on board.

On the Republican side, the majority surveyed in both states said Rand Paul has the most robust organization. His father, Ron, finished third in Iowa and second in New Hampshire in 2012, giving the Kentucky senator a network to build from.

“Paul probably has the best organization at this point, with good management and strong grass roots,” said a New Hampshire Republican. “Others will catch up and level this out though.”

Others in Iowa mentioned retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, who has benefited from an aggressive movement to draft him into the race, and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, who has been spending a lot of time in the state.

Does being a Bush help or hurt Jeb? Insiders are split.

Most Democrats think George W. Bush would be a serious drag on Jeb in a general election. But Republicans are almost evenly divided about whether the Bush name is more of an asset or a liability for the former governor.

“It is a wash if Jeb gets out and shows he is his own person,” said an uncommitted Iowa Republican. Another said anyone who doesn’t think it’s a net positive is “nuts” but added, “Bush fatigue is a real issue.” A New Hampshire Republican called it a “two-edge sword” with the grass roots. Another described it as a “net asset in a primary” and a “net liability in the general.”

If Rand Paul benefits from his father’s network, so does Jeb Bush, wrote another Republican respondent from the Hawkeye State. “On one hand both his Dad and Brother won here,” this person said of Bush. “A lot of activists who were a part of those camps will be a great starting point for an organization. But the name brand isn’t going to help with conservatives, tea party folks and the liberty crowd.”

Clinton could be America’s first woman president. And one of its oldest. The pols think age could be a bigger potential problem.

Asked whether the former First Lady’s age or gender is more of a possible liability in the campaign, six in 10 picked her age. Only a handful said gender; the rest said neither.

“Mitt Romney and Hillary Clinton are the same age, but that won’t stop someone like, say, Rand Paul, whose father ran for president in his mid-70s, from trying to make it a thing,” said a New Hampshire Democrat.

An Iowa Democrat said that Clinton’s gender will be the bigger issue, “but that won’t manifest till the general election.” Others called the question absurd.

Several Republicans worried that Clinton’s potential to break the ultimate glass ceiling is a big asset and may draw independent women to her candidacy.

Yes, the inside line has Hillary Clinton walking away with the Democratic nod.

Almost no one in either party thinks Clinton won’t wind up winning both early states. They may want her to spend time on the ground and insist that she’ll have to earn it, but there are few who doubt that she’ll win at the end of the day. Clinton finished third in Iowa last time and won an upset in New Hampshire.

“It seems very unlikely that anyone in the primary field as of now could come near her,” said an Iowa Democrat. “Nobody sees that changing, and Iowa Democrats are equal parts bored and furious about it.”

There are varying opinions about who, if anyone, will emerge as Clinton’s main Democratic challenger. Most Democrats said no one. Warren was the most mentioned, followed by former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley, ex-Virginia Sen. Jim Webb and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders. Just one Democrat mentioned Vice President Joe Biden.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans see Ted Cruz as likeliest to emerge as the social conservative favorite.

Evangelicals picked the last two winners of the Iowa caucuses: Mike Huckabee and Rick Santorum. Both are running again, but neither can count on the support they had in 2008 and 2012, respectively. An Iowa Republican predicted that “a firebrand” like the Texas senator is more likely to win over base voters.

Among GOP insiders, twice as many picked Cruz to become the leading social conservative candidate as anyone else. But the field is scattered, with nominations for Santorum, Huckabee, Carson, Walker, Rubio, Bobby Jindal and others.

“I think in the short term it will be Ted Cruz,” said an Iowa Republican. “In the long-term I think a guy like Santorum will emerge again because of his ability to weave” his moral beliefs through an array of social and pocketbook issues.

A New Hampshire Republican warned against counting out Huckabee: “It depends on how well a campaign [he] runs.”

Political chatter this week is all about Scott Walker not having graduated from college. Does it matter? Our insiders say no.

The question of Walker’s lack of a college degree split respondents: A few more said it will hurt than help his prospects. Several of those who thought it would be a plus remarked it could enhance his “regular guy” image.

But very few believe Walker’s scholastic deficit will move votes.

“A surprising number of people seem to know Harry Truman pulled it off and the Democratic Party Chair here is also without a college degree and the sky has not fallen,” said one New Hampshire Democrat. “The precise circumstances of leaving college—not the fact of no degree—could be more problematic to New Hampshire voters if the circumstances are unsavory.”

“I can’t wait to see this play out,” said an Iowa Democrat. “I will be terribly disappointed if one of his rivals, or a surrogate, does not put their foot in their mouth on this issue. … I think it will make him seem more populist.”

Who’s a bigger help to Hillary? Both Democrats and Republicans pick Bill Clinton over Obama.

The former president is viewed by both Democrats and Republicans as much more of an asset for Hillary than Obama. Only one of the Democrats surveyed think that he hurts her, although two other Democrats said there are sure to be some moments where he becomes unhelpful – just like in 2008.

All but a handful of Republicans think having Bill Clinton on the campaign trail helps her.

Among 31 Democrats who answered the question, 16 said Obama is an asset, while 7 said he is a liability. The rest said they’re either unsure or it depends on what happens overseas and with the economy.

“The President is up and down in New Hampshire like a yo-yo,” said a Democrat there.
“They should see him as an asset, but I am not sure that they do,” added an Iowa Democrat. “He will win them caucus voters and help solidify her base.”

Spat highlights jockeying among Clinton campaign surrogates (AP)
By Ken Thomas and Philip Elliott
February 12, 2015
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — The ugly public spat was, perhaps, inevitable.

With Hillary Rodham Clinton more or less the only game in town for Democratic talent seeking a piece of the 2016 presidential race, the independent, campaign-like apparatus that has sprung up around her has become an uneasy grouping of longtime loyalists and former rivals. All are looking for a share of the money and prestige that comes as part of working on a presidential election.

That jockeying for position burst into public view this week when David Brock, a Clinton critic-turned-defender, dramatically resigned from the board of a Democratic super PAC following a newspaper report that he said rivals helped engineer to make him look like an inefficient manager of donors' dollars. Just a few hours later, and after the intervention of two longtime Clinton allies, Brock issued a statement saying he'd consider coming back.

The spectacle was the sort of politics-as-blood-sport relished by some in Washington, but one with the potential for real consequences for the former secretary of state. If she becomes the Democratic nominee, Clinton will need a unified network of such outside groups that can help her official campaign compete with the collection of Republican-aligned outfits poised to spend hundreds of millions of dollars to keep her out of the White House.

Who runs them, and who personally profits from doing so, needs to come second, said John Morgan, a Florida attorney and a top campaign donor for former President Bill Clinton and President Barack Obama.

"This can't be about the consultants making money," he said. "This has to be about Hillary Clinton being president."

Clinton, who has kept a low profile in recent weeks, is being advised by several longtime aides and veterans of Obama's two winning campaigns. Without much apparent competition for the party's nomination, the former first lady and New York senator has signaled that she may wait until the summer to fully launch her bid.

In that vacuum, Democrats involved with super PACs and other such outside groups are taking on a larger role, already helping defend Clinton against Republicans and actively preparing for the campaign.

While outside groups, a catch-all term for any political organization that isn't Clinton's yet-to-launch official campaign, cannot coordinate activities with that eventual campaign, they will be crucial to providing technical know-how and deep pockets, while also conducting research, running TV ads and cultivating rank-and-file activists on Clinton's behalf.

Jockeying for position inside the unofficial apparatus is underway, and with it comes tensions.

The latest rift emerged after The New York Times reported that two firms led by Brock, a powerful Democratic operative, had paid a fundraiser a 12.5 percent commission on large donations to his groups. The commissions led to more than $6 million in fees for the fundraiser and her staff during the past several years, the newspaper reported. While not illegal, that high commission was cash that went to a fundraising consultant — not to the groups' stated mission — and it ran counter to the typical practice of paying a monthly retainer.

Calling the newspaper report a "political hit job" orchestrated by his rivals, Brock angrily resigned from the board of Priorities USA, a super PAC that expects to be a major outside advertising partner for Clinton in 2016. The group had expected Brock's organizations to partner with Priorities, and Brock's flare-up threatened to upend the longstanding plans to leave research and fact checking to his orbit.

Leaders of the group intervened, spoke with Brock and said they would take his concerns seriously. Brock said later that day he would consider rejoining the board, thus ending a standoff that played out publicly and invoked memories of the infighting that plagued Clinton's campaign in 2008.

Priorities essentially sat out the 2014 elections to avoid competing for donations with Democrats running in the midterm elections. The group, which spent more than $70 million on the 2012 election, ended last year with nearly $500,000 in the bank and isn't yet raising money.

"We have said from the very beginning that we wouldn't start fundraising without a candidate, and that is still the case," Jonathan Mantz, Priorities' senior adviser for finance, said in a statement. "Make no mistake, we will have the resources we need to be effective and to work with our allies to help elect Hillary Clinton in 2016."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Those resources will need to be deep, as Democrats expect to face a tsunami of Republican money. Groups backed by conservative billionaires Charles and David Koch alone want to raise and spend almost $1 billion on elections in 2016, hoping to recapture the White House for the GOP.

Since Clinton may not launch her presidential bid until the summer, there could be months of sluggish or stalled fundraising, increasing the competition among the outside groups.

Morgan, for example, said former Obama campaign manager Jim Messina, now the co-chair of Priorities, emailed him recently asking him to donate $25,000 to support Ready for Hillary, a separate super PAC promoting a future Clinton campaign. Morgan said he declined because he wanted to devote all of his fundraising energies to an official Clinton campaign, once she announces.

"I said to (former President Clinton), 'If she runs and you want me to do a fundraiser ... I'm all-in, just tell me when,'" Morgan said, describing a recent phone call with the former president.

By then, some Democrats say, the squabbling will have subsided.

"At the end of the day, when we have a candidate that we nominate, Democrats will be together," said Randi Weingarten, the president of the American Federation of Teachers and a Priorities board member, adding that Brock had done "terrific work" and said the kerfuffle would soon pass.

David Axelrod: 'Podesta has to get control of the Clinton operation' (Politico)

By Lucy McCalmont

February 12, 2015

Politico

David Axelrod says likely incoming Hillary Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta already has his work cut out for him and needs to get the presumed campaign in order.

"John Podesta has to get control of the Clinton operation. And I think that's part of his job over there," the Obama campaign guru said Wednesday on MSNBC's "Hardball."

Even though Clinton has yet to announce a 2016 bid, the widely expected campaign has already had its fair share of infighting, specifically among its fundraisers.

The Clinton-backing group Priorities USA Action is coming up short on pledged donations as other groups seek to shore up cash for the former secretary of state, POLITICO reported. Earlier in the week, David Brock resigned from the super PAC's board, implying the leadership has differing agendas.

Podesta, a top aide in the Obama White House, is expected to take a leading role in the Clinton campaign. Last month it was confirmed that Podesta would be stepping down from his White House post in February. Clinton is expected to make an announcement in the spring about whether she will run.

The infighting is fodder for mocking. During an event in New Hampshire on Wednesday, Democratic strategist James Carville joked that he had some "breaking news" regarding a diplomatic breakthrough.

Carville said Secretary of State John Kerry "has just announced a cease-fire between Hillary's 'super PACs,'" The New York Times reported.

Democrats choose Philadelphia as site of 2016 convention (AP)
By Ken Thomas
February 12, 2015
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Democrats will nominate their pick to succeed President Barack Obama in Philadelphia next summer, choosing a patriotic backdrop — think the Liberty Bell and the Declaration of Independence — in a state that's voted their way in the past six presidential elections.

The Democratic National Committee said Thursday the convention will be held the week of July 25, 2016, in Philadelphia, which beat two other finalists: Brooklyn, New York, and Columbus, Ohio.

"There is clearly no better city to have this special event than Philadelphia. The role of Philadelphia in shaping our nation's history is unmatched," said Florida Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz, the DNC chair.

The City of Brotherly Love, famous for its roots in the nation's founding, scrumptious cheese steaks and Rocky Balboa boxing films, is poised to be the site where President Barack Obama hands the reins of the Democratic Party to Hillary Rodham Clinton, their party's leading contender for president if she runs again.

Clinton, a former New York senator, has deep ties to the city and state: Her husband, former President Bill Clinton, twice carried the commonwealth in the 1990s and their family counts ex-Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell and Philadelphia Mayor Michael Nutter — key members of the convention's host committee — as allies. During a campaign stop in Philadelphia last fall, Clinton recalled her father's upbringing in Scranton, 125 miles northwest of the city, and summer vacations at a family cottage on Lake Winola, 15 miles farther north.

Philadelphia's organizers plan to hold the convention at the Wells Fargo Center, the home of the NBA's Philadelphia 76ers and NHL's Philadelphia Flyers, with events also at the city's convention center.

The Wells Fargo Center is part of a sports complex that includes the homes of baseball's Philadelphia Phillies and the NFL's Philadelphia Eagles, giving Democrats the option of staging its final night in the open air. Obama delivered his acceptance speech in 2008 at Denver's Invesco Field at Mile High.

Philadelphia hosted the Republican National Convention in 2000 and the Vatican chose the city as the site for the World Meeting of Families, which Pope Francis is to attend in September.

With Republicans holding their national convention in Cleveland the preceding week, both parties will make their made-for-TV pitches in neighboring states familiar with hard-nose presidential politics.

Democrats have carried Pennsylvania in every presidential election since 1992 but the GOP often covets the state.

Ohio remains one of the most contested states in recent presidential elections and is a linchpin for Democrats. The last Democrat to win the White House without carrying Ohio was John F. Kennedy in 1960, and no Republican ever has.

In recent elections, Democrats have picked battleground states, choosing Denver in 2008 and Charlotte, North Carolina, in 2012. Obama's campaigns used the conventions to register new voters and recruit volunteers.

Electoral politics appeared to be less of a factor this time, with a greater focus on available hotel rooms, transportation, security and fundraising.

Democrats could have chosen Columbus, giving the party a fitting place to respond to Republicans departing Cleveland. Or they could have turned to Brooklyn, where New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio made a major push to land the convention to promote the city as an urban success story.

Wasserman Schultz said the decision was difficult, but Philadelphia offered the best combination of logistics, security and finances. She denied New York City's recent tensions between the police and de Blasio played a factor.

The convention is expected to cost about $84 million. Lily Adams, a DNC spokeswoman, said the contract "does not prohibit the host committee from accepting corporate contributions," a break from past practices under Obama.

Hillary Clinton's Play for Pennsylvania (National Journal)
By Emily Schultheis
February 12, 2015
National Journal

Democrats face two major demographic challenges in the 2016 presidential campaign. First, can Hillary Clinton, assuming she's the party's nominee, win back the white working-class voters who have drifted toward Republicans in recent years? And second, will she be able to maintain the Democratic coalition that twice elected Barack Obama president—including the sky-high turnout among African-American voters his campaign spurred?

Those questions will be partly answered in Pennsylvania, where Democrats have just announced they're holding their 2016 convention.

As Philadelphia's selection for the 2016 Democratic convention spurs headlines about the symbolism of Independence Hall and the Liberty Bell, the importance of the state goes far beyond that. It's a microcosm of the challenges Democrats face in putting together a winning coalition.

Pennsylvania is the GOP's perennial white whale: Every four years, Republicans puts money and time into a last-minute effort to mine the state's electoral votes—and every time since 1988, they've been unsuccessful. Though it's still early, Democrats and observers in the state say that with Democrats' presidential-year electoral advantages there, there's little chance that dynamic will change this time around.

"It's a state that has become solidly blue in presidential politics and now, in many ways, is a cornerstone of the Democratic electoral coalition, along with other big states—along with New York, Illinois, and California," said Chris Borick, a veteran Pennsylvania pollster at Muhlenberg College, adding that winning Pennsylvania is "almost a given for Democrats."

A February Quinnipiac poll found Clinton starting out strong in Pennsylvania with high favorability ratings and double-digit leads over all her would-be GOP challengers. Fifty-five percent of the state's voters viewed her favorably, compared with 38 percent who viewed her unfavorably—far better than any of the GOP hopefuls fared. In hypothetical head-to-head matchups, Clinton bested New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie by 11 points (50-39), former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush by 15 points (50-35), Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky by 19 points (53-34), and both former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and former Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania by 20 points (54-34).

But Pennsylvania is a geographically and demographically diverse state—and how Clinton fares there among the state's electorate will be an indication of her ability to shape a winning national coalition. Victory for Democrats now largely hinges on the southeastern part of the state, where they need to draw a strong turnout in Philadelphia proper and to win a majority in the four suburban counties (Montgomery, Bucks, Chester, and Delaware) that surround it. At the same time, a significant chunk of the state—the southwestern part near Pittsburgh and the northeastern part surrounding Scranton—is full of white, working-class voters whom Democrats have struggled with in recent years.

Pennsylvania Democratic operatives and observers say Clinton has a track record of connecting better with the state's working-class electorate than Obama did in 2008 and 2012—but that African-American turnout drop-off is certainly a concern. In an interview with BuzzFeed, Obama said he didn't "think any president inherits a coalition," adding that "any candidate has to win over people based on what they stand for, what their message is, what their vision is for the future."

Back in the 2008 Democratic primary, when Clinton defeated Obama by just under 10 points, the former secretary of State did well among exactly those kinds of voters. Exit polls found Clinton ahead of Obama among Pennsylvania's white voters, low- and middle-income voters, and those without a college degree.

"Her father came from Scranton, so she's always had a strong base there in the same way that Joe Biden has," said Charlie Lyons, a veteran Democratic strategist in the state. "And I think she comes out of that area strong, and in the southwest I think she has the potential to come out perhaps even stronger than the president did."

As a surrogate for now-Gov. Tom Wolf in Philadelphia last fall, Clinton came out swinging with what observers say is the closest indication she's given of the kind of message her campaign could have—one heavy on economic fairness, equal pay, and education funding. These are the kinds of issues that play well among both minority voters and working-class whites.

As for African-American voters in Philadelphia, observers in the state say it would be tough for Clinton to match the kind of turnout Obama drew among that demographic—but that the drop-off wouldn't be enough to affect her chances in the state. In 2008, exit polling data showed Obama winning 95 percent of African-American voters in Pennsylvania, compared with just 5 percent for Republican nominee John McCain; even if turnout among that demographic decreases, the margins will likely be similar.

"She clearly has room to build on voters that Obama didn't have—while being challenged to make sure she has the same or close levels of turnout in the Democrat-rich Philadelphia city limits," Borick said.

Even if Pennsylvania seems unlikely to top 2016's list of presidential swing states, it will undoubtedly be home to one of the most competitive Senate campaigns on the map this cycle: the race to unseat GOP Sen. Pat Toomey, who rode into office on the Republican wave of 2010.

And while party conventions rarely have an effect on the presidential electoral outcome in a state, they're known for energizing the party base and drawing attention to in-state candidates—which, for Philadelphia, could have a positive effect on turning the city's African-American voters out to the polls that fall for both Clinton and Toomey's Democratic challenger.

"Pat Toomey is going to be seriously challenged," said Dan Fee, a veteran of both of former Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell's gubernatorial campaigns. "This is a year, and this is a race, in which there will be significant turnout in areas that will never vote for Pat Toomey."

Hillary Clinton is hiding (WAPO)
By Jennifer Rubin
February 12, 2015
The Washington Post

The Wall Street Journal reports some Democrats are nervous Hillary Clinton has not begun her campaign:

Some Democrats worry that if Mrs. Clinton coasts to the nomination without much of a fight, she might be rusty when she squares off against her Republican opponent in debates. “You wouldn’t want the first significant televised debate to be against a Republican opponent,” said Douglas Goldman of San Francisco, a longtime Democratic donor.

The report solemnly observes, “Mrs. Clinton hasn’t been invisible. She sends out tweets on issues that are in the news, delivers paid speeches and has been quietly assembling a senior campaign team.” So she is only visible to a group that has ponied up $200,000 or to future employees?! Well, for mere voters she is invisible, and more important to the media, she is unreachable.

Think of the questions she’d have to answer if she were out in public these days:

* Was the attack on the kosher supermarket in France aimed at killing Jews?

* Should the president identify our enemies’ ideology as FDR identified the Nazis?

* Since we now have to go back into Iraq, was it a mistake, in 20-20 hindsight, to pull all our troops out?

* Are you in favor of the sort of concessions the president is making to Iran, such as allowing the regime to keep thousands of centrifuges?

* Iran wields influence in Syria, Lebanon, Iraq and Yemen. Is this a bad thing? If so what went wrong in the U.S. approach to the Middle East?

* Is our Russia policy a success, as the president has claimed?

* Would you have refused to meet with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and publicly complained about his invitation to speak before Congress?

* When have U.S.-Israeli relations been so poor? Why do you think nearly 3/4 of Israelis don’t trust President Obama?

* Why are Sunni allies complaining about the administration’s approach to the Islamic State?

* Would you condition sufficient funding of our military during wartime on a tax hike?

* Is it appropriate to tell the enemy what troops we will use and when we will leave?

* Should we have released Guantanamo detainees to Yemen?

* Do you think that if we closed Guantanamo and moved the detainees to prisons in the homeland the Islamic terrorists would behave any differently?

* You proclaimed our Libya policy to be a great success. Were you wrong?

* How did Islamic terror groups manage to grow and spread so dramatically in the last six years?

* Would you alter the NSA surveillance program that was found to have no abuses and was successful in disrupting terrorist plots?

* Was it wrong to say in 2009 that a decade of war was ending?

* Should a U.S. president cite war fatigue as a reason for not acting to defend U.S. interests?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

* Why did human rights worsen on your watch in places like Russia, China and the Middle East?

* What foreign governments have paid for your speeches or made contributions to the Clinton foundation?

You would think Clinton would be anxious to share her wisdom with the country and to influence deeply consequential decisions that the next president will have to live with. If she is avoiding doing so because of her personal political ambitions, that would be rather self-indulgent, no? And if she does not want to upset the president or left-wing voters, how is she ever going to make tough decisions? Arguably, if she does not want to tell us her views or hasn't decided which views play best, she really should not be the future commander in chief, many would agree.

The Democrats should be less concerned about fundraising and debate prep and more concerned about why Clinton is in hiding. Jeb Bush will be giving a major foreign policy address next week. Former Texas governor Rick Perry routinely writes and speaks on national security issues. Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) is among the leading voices in the Senate on issues ranging from Iran to the Islamic State to human rights. And yet, the former secretary of state, who is supposed to be the smartest woman on the planet and the most expert candidate on foreign policy, can manage only an occasional tweet. That should be deeply worrisome to Democrats.

New faces may give GOP edge in 2016 (Dallas Morning News)
By Carl Leubsdorf
February 12, 2015
The Dallas Morning News

Americans always like something new. A recent focus-group session with a cross section of Colorado voters showed how that might affect the unfolding 2016 presidential campaign.

Participants in the nonpartisan focus group conducted by veteran Democratic Party pollster Peter Hart showed disdain for the older, more established 2016 hopefuls (think Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush) and positive curiosity about two newer faces (think Sens. Elizabeth Warren and Rand Paul).

About the same time, 2012 Republican nominee Mitt Romney echoed those sentiments in announcing he would not run again, saying he believed “one of our next generation of Republican leaders … may well emerge as being better able to defeat the Democratic nominee.”

It would be surprising if such attitudes didn’t surface elsewhere. Overall, they suggest a potential Republican advantage, thanks to a large field of newer faces. And it should be a warning to Democrats, who are not only poised to nominate Clinton but also have a far smaller bench of future leaders.

This is the political fallout from the sweeping Republican 2010 and 2014 victories, which produced a new generation of GOP officeholders and prevented a similar group of Democrats from emerging.

The GOP field includes four potential contenders in their 40s - Govs. Scott Walker of Wisconsin and Bobby Jindal of Louisiana and Sens. Ted Cruz of Texas and Marco Rubio of Florida. Four others are in their 50s - Govs. Chris Christie of New Jersey and Mike Pence of Indiana, and Paul of Kentucky and Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina. Former Govs. Bush of Florida, Mike Huckabee of Arkansas and Rick Perry of Texas, and Dr. Ben Carson are in their 60s.

By contrast, of the six most-mentioned Democrats, only Warren, 65, and former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley, 52, are younger than Clinton, 67. Vice President Joe Biden, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb are all older.

The GOP also has a broad array of up-and-coming prospects. Sen. Kelly Ayotte of New Hampshire and newly elected Sens. Cory Gardner of Colorado and Joni Ernst of Iowa are all in their 40s.

A corresponding Democratic list is far smaller. It includes Texas’ 40-year-old Castro twins - Secretary of Housing and Urban Development Julián Castro, the former mayor of San Antonio, and Rep. Joaquin Castro. But neither has won statewide office. The number of fellow Democratic 40-somethings who have won is small, led by Sens. Cory Booker of New Jersey, 45; and Kirsten Gillibrand of New York, 48.

Prospects in their 50s include Sens. Tim Kaine of Virginia and Amy Klobuchar of Minnesota, New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo and California Attorney General Kamala Harris, a favorite to win a U.S. Senate seat in 2016. Sens. Claire McCaskill of Missouri and Mark Warner of Virginia are in their early 60s.

It’s easy to see Clinton tapping one of these as her running mate - perhaps Kaine. He’s from a crucial swing state, was Richmond’s mayor and Virginia’s governor, and is an emerging leader in Senate debates on authorizing military action abroad.

But Romney’s withdrawal virtually ensures a race pitting an older Democrat against a younger Republican. The question is how much younger. Bush is 51/2 years younger than Clinton, while Walker is 20 years younger.

History sends a mixed message. In four of the last six elections, Democrats Barack Obama and Bill Clinton defeated significantly older Republican rivals. But in the 1980s, two older Republicans, Ronald Reagan and George Bush, beat younger Democrats.

On NBC’s Meet the Press, Chuck Todd noted that, on average, presidents elected in the past century were 7.6 years younger than their predecessors. In 2016, the issue may be whether youth again carries the day or Obama’s presidency spurs voters to elect someone older and more experienced.

They lean Democratic, but one union likes Jeb Bush (Miami Herald)
By David Lightman
February 12, 2015
The Miami Herald

WASHINGTON

Courting political power brokers at a recent closed-door meeting, Jeb Bush included one unlikely face.

There among big names from the worlds of lobbying, fundraising and politics was one leader of a labor union, Harold Schaitberger, general president of the International Association of Fire Fighters. “They went around the room and introduced themselves. They came to me, and you could almost see everyone taking note,” he said later of the meeting hosted by the National Association of Wholesaler-Distributors.

That meeting, one of several Bush held in Washington over the last month, was an important moment in the former Florida governor’s campaign to woo the nation’s political A list as he considers a run for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination.

The firefighters’ union is likely to endorse a Democrat for president, just as it’s done in every recent election. But lots of members have a clear affection for Bush, a strong supporter of their interests when he was governor. And that also could temper the firefighters’ support for likely Democratic nominee Hillary Clinton.

“Jeb Bush was a governor who understood our profession,” Schaitberger told McClatchy, “and had a decent track record of supporting our agenda.”

The union plans to hear from candidates at a March forum in Washington and to make an endorsement later this year.

Unions have long been important Democratic supporters and donors, but the rank and file has been more willing to consider Republicans. About 18 percent of 2012 presidential voters lived in union households; 58 percent voted for President Barack Obama but a solid 40 percent went for Republican Mitt Romney.

The firefighters union, for example, estimates its membership is about 40 percent Democrat, 40 percent Republican and 20 percent unaffiliated.

While the union’s money and manpower are hardly a guarantee of success, it can matter. In 2004, then-Sen. John Kerry was in a tight race for the Democratic presidential nomination with Rep. Richard Gephardt of Missouri and Gov. Howard Dean of Vermont, the favorites of most unions.

The firefighters were the only major union to back Kerry, and they poured time and manpower into the Kerry campaign. Their presence throughout Iowa’s 99 counties was crucial -- every community has a firehouse or has dealt with the people who work there.

They helped propel Kerry to a come-from-behind victory over Dean in the state’s first-in-the-nation caucus. Dean reacted with a now infamous scream on TV; Kerry went on to win the nomination.

The union was less effective in the 2008 cycle. It backed another longtime supporter, Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut, for the Democratic nomination. But Dodd’s campaign fizzled and died in Iowa. The union supported President Barack Obama in the general election.

In this election cycle, the firefighters are likely to have another old friend to consider, Clinton.

She would appear to have the edge for their endorsement. After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Clinton, then a senator from New York, quickly helped the firefighters get aid and resources.

Bush, though, probably would not be subject to a negative campaign from the firefighters, and their local word of mouth could be a boon.

“The AFL-CIO and the service workers unions are more prominent, but because of the public safety aspect, the firefighters have a lot of respect. That translates to clout,” said Wayne MacDonald, a former New Hampshire Republican chairman.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Their criteria for support is simple: Back us and we'll back you, or at least back away from hurting you. In the 2012 election cycle, the union spent $5.3 million, and in last year's elections, spent $6.4 million. In recent years, as Republicans have turned more conservative, contributions have been tilted more toward Democrats.

The union did back five winning Republican U.S. Senate candidates last year and made no endorsement in North Carolina and Virginia, where Democratic incumbents faced tough challenges.

Bush is recalled fondly because as governor, he pushed a plan to restore some pension benefits to firefighters and law enforcement officers that had been reduced several years earlier. He also named Charles Kossuth Jr., a veteran firefighter and union official, as a commissioner of the powerful Florida Public Employees Relations Commission.

The Florida Professional Firefighters union endorsed Bush for governor in 1998 and 2002. James Tolley, the Florida union's president, said Bush could do well among members next year.

Sympathetic firefighters also could give Bush credibility with working-class voters. Teachers' unions were angry at him for his efforts to revamp the state's education system. Government employees' organizations disliked how he ended civil service protection for thousands of workers.

"He drew the line at firefighters and law enforcement," said Matthew Corrigan, author of "Conservative Hurricane: How Jeb Bush Remade Florida."

The national firefighters union will consider other Republicans and Democrats. Virtually all potential candidates will get a chance, though one exception is New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie.

He's not invited to the March forum. "He's been trying to destroy our retirement system from day one," Schaitberger said. "He dishonored their service as public servants." Christie has been pushing for cuts to future pensions, citing the system's growing unfunded liabilities.

Their ire at Christie illustrates the other strategic edge firefighters offer. "You can't double-cross us and get away with it," said Schaitberger.

Sometimes people do. The union had an icy relationship with former President George W. Bush, particularly after he vetoed a 2002 spending bill he had earlier said he'd sign. It was to provide financial help for the firefighters, including money to help improve radio communications.

Jeb Bush, though, has a very different history, a plus in an election where voters are likely to listen to the people who rescue and protect them.

That's why, said MacDonald, "the firefighters can be useful."

Major prod from NY's minor party (Newsday)
By Dan Janison
February 13, 2015
Newsday

While others wait for Hillary Rodham Clinton to announce her intentions, New York's left-of-center Working Families Party this week urged Sen. Elizabeth Warren to jump into next year's presidential race.

Warren (D-Mass.) has said she plans to finish her first Senate term instead. But that stance may not matter any more to Warren fans than Clinton's still-uncommitted position deters her supporters.

WFP members comprise less than half of 1 percent of the state's registered voters. But the union-backed minor party makes it a priority to prod Democrats in a liberal direction. The thinking is that the presence of Warren, who's relatively new on the scene, could force Clinton to choose between pleasing the bluest parts of a blue state or being more of a centrist.

More significantly, WFP's statement comes on what has long been the political home turf of the former senator and U.S. secretary of state.

Saying he was speaking only for himself, former Gov. David A. Paterson, now chairman of the state Democratic Party, noted he agrees more with WFP stances than do some other Democrats. But Paterson warned "extremism is what made the Republican Party lose the last two elections and could make them lose a third in 2016."

Paterson inveighed against Democrats "beating ourselves" through dissension. "Maybe the ... [WFP is] just reminding some of us, or all of us, of the valid points they make," he said.

Paterson, like other New York Democratic players, stuck with Clinton's candidacy in 2008 even after it became clear she'd lose the nomination to then-Sen. Barack Obama.

Asked about the presumption that New York is Clinton country, Bill Lipton, the WFP's statewide director, replied through a spokeswoman: "Senator Warren's populist message resonates with working families nationwide. A Warren candidacy ensures that every contender will need to address issues that matter to working families." That can be interpreted to mean Warren could prod Clinton to take what progressives view as better economic positions than she'd be inclined to take otherwise.

Lipton said on Sunday that Warren has "taken the fight directly to Wall Street and to the big banks that increasingly have a vise grip on our economy and our democracy."

New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio, an ally of the WFP, also counts himself among friends of the former secretary of state, having helped run her successful 2000 campaign for the Senate and worked in the administration of President Bill Clinton.

De Blasio took questions at City Hall yesterday after it was announced that the 2016 Democratic National Convention will be held in Philadelphia rather than in Brooklyn or Columbus, Ohio. One reporter asked if he thought the city at least won a consolation prize in the form of Clinton seeking to open a Brooklyn campaign headquarters. De Blasio didn't bite. "It's a perfectly fair question, but it's a hypothetical wrapped in another hypothetical," he said. "First of all, she has gone out of her way to say she has not made a decision yet on whether she will run.

"Second, clearly, there has been nothing communicated to us about where the headquarters will be," he said. "If she gets to the point of running, I would strongly encourage her to have her headquarters in New York City, in any of our boroughs. But that's still a ways off."

Progressives: Between Hillary and a Hard Place (Daily Beast)
By David Freedlander
February 13, 2015
Daily Beast

Elizabeth says she's a no. Bernie is a fighter, but he is also, you know, Bernie. O'Malley doesn't excite, Webb used to be a Republican, and Hillary is, well, a Clinton.

The 2016 presidential primaries are fast approaching. What is a good progressive to do?

At a moment when a handful of issues that liberal activists have campaigned on for years, from raising the minimum wage to the growth of corporate power to climate change to criminal justice reform, are entering the mainstream debate—even within the Republican Party—progressives are facing the prospect of being rendered voiceless just as the nation is tuning in to the 2016 presidential primary.

"What progressives are saying is, how are we going to get people out of bed to vote if we don't stand up on the issues that people care about," said Ed Ott, a longtime New York labor leader and a professor of labor studies at the City University of New York. "There is a lot of anger at the Democratic Party. People want to know where they stand."

This strange moment for progressives was crystallized over the weekend when the liberal Working Families Party, which is based in Clinton's home state of New York and which backed her in both of her Senate runs, decided to join liberal groups such as Move On and Democracy for America in supporting a Draft Warren effort.

The move dismayed some progressives. Warren has consistently maintained she isn't running, and fantasies that she will change her mind distract from some more achievable goals, some liberals maintain.

"The whole Warren thing is kind of silly," said Howie Klein, a progressive activist who blogs at the website Down with Tyranny. "If I could pick anybody to run for president it would be her, but she is not going to do it. It started out as a not-bad idea but I think it has gone on long enough."

Without a candidate to get behind, some liberal and labor groups are focusing instead on changing the complexion of the electorate, hoping that Clinton can be pulled to the left by forces on the ground. After a summit on the issue of raising wages (headlined, it should be noted, by Elizabeth Warren) the AFL-CIO announced that they would barnstorm the first four primary states to rally voters around the issue.

The Progressive Change Campaign Committee, meanwhile, is trying to persuade progressive leaders in Iowa and New Hampshire to hold off announcing that they are ready for Hillary until she publicly announces where she stands on key liberal issues such as expanding Social Security and breaking up big banks.

"We really have a one of a kind role at this point, which is being a grassroots force that is working to incentivize all of the Democratic presidential candidates to sound more like Elizabeth Warren," said Adam Green, the group's executive director. "It's a different strategy, but we want Warren's positions to be the mainstream Democratic position."

Although PCCC did not sign on to the Draft Warren effort, Green said that the organizing around it is helping to pull Clinton to the left even without Warren.

"In many ways the prospect of Elizabeth Warren running might be more powerful than the actual candidacy of Elizabeth Warren," Green added. "If she makes no comment about running for president for the next six months there is every incentive in the world for Hillary Clinton to co-opt her message so that Warren doesn't jump in. If Hillary said, 'We should cut Social Security, we don't need to regulate the banks,' I think you would see not just Warren but a lot of people jump in."

A dozen progressive activists, donors and operatives from around the country said much the same thing: their first choice was Warren, and despite her denials, they believe there is still time for her to get into the race, and that she would meet a groundswell of grassroots and fundraising support if she did.

"We are in a conditional situation—if Hillary runs strong [Warren] won't run," said Bob Fertik, a progressive activist and political consultant. "But Hillary could decide not to run, or she could flame out on any given day for any reason—it could be about Bill, it could be a thousand reasons. If that happens then the entire progressive movement would rise up behind Elizabeth Warren."

Most progressives interviewed for this story did not sound particularly enthusiastic about the other Democratic challengers.

On Martin O'Malley, the two-term governor of Maryland who is running cautiously to the left of Clinton, Fertik said, "Nobody has heard of him."

"He seems like someone who is running really hard to be vice president. I have no feel for the guy one way or the other," said Klein.

"I can't imagine he is going to get traction," said Robert Borosage, the head of the liberal Campaign for America's Future.

Bernie Sanders should be the progressive choice. The socialist senator from Vermont rails against the billionaire class, and unlike Warren, has never been wrapped up in the political money game. Which is precisely the problem.

"Unlike Elizabeth, Bernie is actually running for president. What do you think it says about him that we are all trying to get Elizabeth in," said one person involved in the Draft Warren effort.

"Sanders is extremely progressive," said Douglas Kahn, who has given more than $100,000 to liberal candidates over the last couple of election cycles. "I would love his ideas and principles to be the platform of the…Party. That is not likely to happen."

Klein has been raising money for Sanders, but now he thinks the Draft Warren effort has sucked up all of the progressive energy, and he is not certain Sanders will run.

"I think the whole Elizabeth thing has been very disappointing for Bernie."

Some progressives say they remain curious about the prospect of Webb.

"I think he is going to be stronger than a lot of people think," said Borosage. "Hillary wants to be to the right of Obama on foreign policy, and that opens up space for [Virginia's Jim] Webb, especially if we get ensnared in the Ukraine or the Middle East and things go south. There remains a huge anti-war sentiment out there."

"People have short memories," responded Klein. "Webb is no lefty. He was to the right of Hillary Clinton on practically every vote."

Which raises the question: What about Hillary? She after all supports Dodd-Frank, favors a higher minimum wage and has long history of fighting for working families. And all the activists spoken to for this article said they would support her in a general election.

But they also said that at last the public seemed interested in income inequality, and they doubted that Hillary Clinton could carry the torch, especially if she coasted in the primary.

"What this election should be about is the very structure of the economy," said Borosage. "And where is Hillary when it comes to shackling Wall Street, when it comes to CEO pay, when it comes to unions. She needs a challenge so we can hear these things out."

Zephyr Teachout, who ran a left-leaning charge against New York Governor Andrew Cuomo in 2014 and who was a key organizer on Howard Dean's 2004 campaign, said there was plenty of time for someone to emerge, someone perhaps who isn't being yet discussed in the corridors of Washington D.C.

"The big fear about Hillary Clinton is that she might be a very weak candidate, and that she doesn't reflect the best interests of a lot of traditional and populists Democrats. I certainly share those fears, but there is plenty of time for a true populist to jump into the race."

So don't despair then?

"No! Despair is the ultimate strategy of the neo-liberals, and it doesn't accomplish anything."

Hillary Clinton's suffocating presence (The Economist)

February 12, 2015

The Economist

THE field of Republican presidential contenders may be limited to a narrow range of conservative fellows in mid- to late-middle age, but at least there are a lot of them. The Democratic field is, for all practical purposes, Hillary Clinton.

Ahead by an average of 49 points in early polls, it is not clear that Mrs Clinton has any serious competition. There is some sign that Joe Biden might jump in, but his poll numbers are dismal for a second-term vice-president. Martin O'Malley, Maryland's former governor, might run. Jim Webb, a former Virginia senator, is a possibility. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, the Senate's loveably irascible socialist, might take the opportunity to speak truth to weary beat reporters. As for Elizabeth Warren, no amount of valentines has wooed her away from her position on not running (though as our Lexington recently noted, her denials are always in the present tense).

There was an air of inevitability about Mrs Clinton early on in the 2008 race, too. However, Barack Obama was, and is, a rare political talent. If anyone comparably gifted is perched on the Democratic bench, his or her light has been kept well hidden. Democrats like to cast Republicans as out-of-touch fuddy-duddies, but the Democratic field, as it now stands, is remarkably long in the tooth, with an average age of 69. The GOP field averages a relatively youthful 57. Where are the Democrats in their avid middle years longing to play on a national stage, labouring now to lay the groundwork for a big run down the road? When the payoff is huge, it can make sense to play even when the odds are slim. Ted Cruz knows he probably won't win this year, but he is bold enough to give it a shot. Why so little intrepid ambition among the Democrats? Mr O'Malley, we salute you.

One partial explanation of the thin Democratic field is that rising talent has been recently nipped in the bud. The past two mid-term elections saw Democrats lose control first of the House in 2010, and then of the Senate in 2014. Meanwhile, Republicans have been taking over statehouses and governorships at a swift rate. Democrats who might have been up and comers came and went.

More importantly, perhaps, is the fact that Mrs Clinton simply scares the bejeezus out of would-be rivals. "For all her positive attributes", writes Dan Balz of the Washington Post, "former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton is a suffocating presence when it comes to intraparty presidential competition". The Clinton machine has been operating nationally, with limited interruptions, for over three decades, leaving Mrs Clinton with unmatched heft within the party. "Her command of the Democratic machinery, from fundraising to grass-roots organizing, is so extensive that almost everyone else is understandably intimidated about even testing their talents against her," Mr Balz says.

Maybe Mrs Clinton has been indeed bigfooting around, scaring off would-be contenders. Or maybe the Democratic establishment, terrorised by the thought of a unified Republican government, has rallied early around their most formidable known quantity, warning off aspirants who might weaken Mrs Clinton in a primary fight. Despite their recent losses in Congress and in the states, the presidential electoral map remains in the Democrats' favour. Why would a party one election away from utter, catastrophic defeat gamble on anyone less unimpeachably solid? For Democrats, this is no time for romance. You may thrill in your heart of hearts to Mrs Warren's polemics against the plutocrats, but if no one but Mrs Clinton seems so certain to withstand the Republican onslaught, you may reasonably wish Mrs Warren, and others with their eyes on the prize, to sit this one out.

But is Mrs Clinton really such a safe bet? She struggled with a concussion and blood clots in 2012. What if something like that happens again? In any case, she is not as spry as she once was. She and Mrs Warren are only a few months apart in age, yet Mrs Warren seems markedly younger and more reliably energetic. It's not nice, but such considerations matter in politics. A cakewalk in the primaries risks leaving vulnerabilities unexposed and unfortified.

It's also worth noting that the Democrats' electoral advantage at the presidential level is not a sure thing. It materialises only if the party machine succeeds in getting young, poor and minority voters to the polls. Mr Obama beat Mrs Clinton from her left, and went on to beat John McCain by exciting sometimes tough-to-reach Democratic constituencies. Mrs Clinton's gender is certainly a source of excitement, but her presidency would mark a shift to the right for Democrats at a time when the party's energy is coming from the left. A competitive primary pitting Mrs Clinton against an attractive progressive rising star or two would test whether she remains capable of generating real enthusiasm across the party's varied base. It seems like a test worth running.

Democrats ought to worry at least a little about the possibility that Hillary Clinton has become the contemporary Democratic version of Bob Dole in 1996: an elder statesman, a presumed nominee, universally admired and, when it really counted, insufficiently voted for.

Will Hillary Run For Bill's Third Term Or Barack's? (Investor's Business Daily)
By Stephen Moore
February 13, 2015
Investor's Business Daily

It's no secret that Hillary Clinton — the former first lady, New York senator and secretary of state — is joined at the hip with President Obama's foreign policy foibles, most notably the Benghazi debacle. But less understood is how much her economic philosophy and positions now overlap with his.

In the debate over what version of Hillary Clinton we would get in the 2016 presidential race — the centrist 1990s "New Democrat" modeled after her husband, Bill, or a replica of the modern leftism of her bitter rival Barack — the liberal/progressive wing of the party has apparently won out.

Clinton gave a hint of this tactical lurch to the left late last year when she infamously declared at a Boston campaign rally: "Don't let anybody tell you it's corporations and businesses that create jobs."

To many political observers, this was her "you didn't build that" moment — as she, like her former boss Obama, gave a haughty scolding to the nation's employers.

The New York Times reported this week that Clinton is seeking advice from a corps of 200 economic advisers, many of whom are retreads from the Obama administration.

The list includes top Obama economists Gene Sterling and Larry Summers, and a cadre of left-wing thinkers from the Center for American Progress. She has opted to endorse the greed-and-envy politics of the old left.

The Times noted that Hillary is expected to embrace "standard Democratic initiatives like raising the minimum wage, investing in infrastructure, closing corporate tax loopholes and cutting taxes for the middle class." Her speeches of late have a sharper anti-business edge than when she ran for president in 2008.

"This is not your father's Democratic Party," laments Larry Kudlow of CNBC. "Hillary has shifted to the populist left on economics and away from her husband's position on things like cutting the capital gains tax and growth policies. I think it's a big mistake."

A review of her speeches of late underscores this sharp departure from the politics of Bill Clinton in the 1990s and her campaign for president in 2008, when she ran as a centrist and got run over by the liberal, populist Obama.

Fearing Warren

Those close to Clinton say that she's committed to not letting that happen again. One long-time adviser tells me, "She is petrified of a challenge" from Elizabeth Warren, the new goddess of the far left, "and she's not going to let that happen again."

This has forced Hillary to veer away from the moderate positions — Robert Rubin economics — that her husband championed during his two terms in the Oval Office: balancing the budget, welfare reform, spending control, tax cuts and free trade.

In the past, Hillary has said positive things about the fossil-fuel revolution in the U.S. and technologies such as fracking that have made shale oil and gas more abundant. Now she sounds as obsessed with climate change as Obama or the radical green activists.

She's also taken on the left's hyper-fascination with income inequality. In a recent speech honoring Robert F. Kennedy, she exhorted:

"What would he say about the fact that such a large portion of economic gains have gone to such a small portion of our population?"

She also cited an array of statistics about the stall in incomes of blacks and Hispanics as "the rich get richer."

Of the sometimes-violent protesters outside of St. Louis this fall, she asked:

"What would Robert Kennedy say to the thousands of Americans marching in our streets demanding justice for all?”

The income inequality issue is tricky for Clinton and all Democrats because the gap between rich and poor has grown wider under Obama. Hillary has tried to strategically separate herself from Obama’s economic results by acknowledging that middle incomes kept falling behind over the past decade.

“Obama’s income-redistribution policies have clearly made the income gap between rich and poor wider,” says economist Richard Vedder of Ohio University and an expert on labor and wages.

He also finds that, under Bill Clinton, the poor and middle class did well. But Hillary is distancing herself from those policies that created a rising tide in the 1980s and 1990s.

Bill’s Legacy

On financial markets, Clinton also seems to be adopting a Wall Street-bashing populism that sounds more like Warren all the time. In response to the GOP’s modest reforms in the Dodd-Frank banking regulation law, she tweeted out to her supporters:

“Attacking financial reform is risky and wrong.”

Her husband signed one of the most sweeping financial deregulation bills in U.S. history, which overturned the Glass-Steagall Act and thus broke down walls between investment and lending banks.

Warren has ramped up her populist rhetoric, attacking deregulation and the Wall Street “weapons of mass financial destruction,” while Clinton has been more guarded.

But can she pull this economic populism off with conviction? This is the woman who, in the 1980s, turned a few thousand dollars into nearly $1 million with fancy (and perhaps shady) cattle futures trading.

While she rails against the rich, she demands $200,000 for speeches to investor groups railing against the rich. She has collected millions of dollars of political donations from Wall Street hedge fund and derivative traders, whom she now says make too much money and helped tank the economy seven years ago.

Welcome to Hillary Clinton 2.0 — or is it 3.0? She has drifted to the left with her party over the past decade just as she and her husband veered to the center in the 1990s as the recipe for winning.

Some Clinton insiders I talk to say that she’s merely circling back to her Hillary Rodham Clinton roots, when this young liberal from Vassar in the 1970s lashed out at America’s social injustices — and sermonized about the “politics of meaning” in the 1990s. In 1994, she designed HillaryCare, the precursor to ObamaCare.

A Hillary Clinton presidency is less likely to be a Clinton third term than an Obama third term.

Barack Obama's campaign guru on disappointment--and Hillary

IT DID not take long for David Axelrod, the rumpled campaign genius who steered Barack Obama's rise from state senator to president, to detect that governing the country might prove less uplifting than getting his boss elected. In memoirs published on February 10th Mr Axelrod recalls fretting, soon after the inauguration in 2009, that White House insiders were already talking about breaking Mr Obama's campaign commitments. This prompted Rahm Emanuel, the new president's chief of staff to scream at Mr Axelrod: "I'm god-damned sick of hearing about the fucking campaign. The campaign is over. We're trying to solve some problems here." From this and other clues, Mr Axelrod deduced that there was a "tension" between a campaign that had promised to bring hope and change to America and the task of actually governing.

Mr Axelrod's autobiography, "Believer: My Forty Years in Politics", is in part a story about a broken heart. The Chicago-based strategist was already a veteran when he met Mr Obama. By then he had run (and won) enough campaigns to develop his "remedy not replica" theory of politics. This holds that voters almost always choose change over the status quo, even when a popular incumbent is stepping down, and moreover look for a candidate who seems to correct the perceived weaknesses of a departing leader. He watched Mr Obama deliver a soaring hymn to a post-racial, post-partisan America at the 2004 Democratic National Convention and helped him win election to the Senate in Washington, boosted by opposition to what he called a "dumb" war in Iraq. Soon, Mr Axelrod concluded that the young lawyer might just be the cure for a country sick of George W. Bush.

Mr Axelrod helped his improbable candidate win the 2008 presidential primaries, taking his youth and inexperience and turning them into strengths at a time of deep alienation with politics as usual. He coined the slogan "Yes We Can", and helped craft television ads and speeches in which Mr Obama vowed to tame Washington and restore frayed global alliances.

If "Believer" were merely an account of Mr Axelrod's bruising return to reality, as the 2008 agenda became bogged down by recession, partisanship and gridlock, it would be little more than a historical footnote--even if, as one of the innermost circle, Mr Axelrod has uncommon insights to offer. Notably, the book adds to the growing body of evidence that Mr Obama is quite an odd man. Though Mr Axelrod is at pains to relate how his former boss is more human and anguished by tales of woe and suffering than many suppose, he does concede that Mr Obama is astonishingly self-assured, and self-aware. "I don't need to be president. It turns out that being Barack Obama is a pretty good gig in and of itself," he is quoted telling Mr Axelrod, shortly before announcing his candidacy. After a terrible first debate performance during the 2012 election, Mr Obama confides that he agrees with a pundit who suggests he lacks the "neediness" that drives most politicians to perform in pursuit of "validation". And though Mr Axelrod blames Republicans for wrecking Mr Obama's plans to seek bipartisan deals, the strategist does say that the president has aggravated political opponents by lecturing them on why it is in their own political interests to agree with him.

"Believer" is more than a work of history because of the name of the woman Mr Obama beat to the nomination in 2008. With the most successful Democratic strategist of his generation as the author, "Believer" raises pointed, still-valid questions about Hillary Clinton's presumed ambition to represent her party in 2016. As a loyal Democrat, Mr Axelrod has suggested in interviews around the book's launch that--in the light of Mr Obama's "great, unfulfilled promise" to change Washington--Mrs Clinton's years of Washington experience will be much more of an asset in this campaign than in 2008, allowing her to run as a candidate of change. Yet many of Mr Axelrod's observations about voter disillusion, and the importance of mobilising great armies of enthusiastic volunteers, will still apply in 2016.

Meet Hillary, the candidate of change

Mr Axelrod comes close to conceding that Mrs Clinton was correct in her pessimism about Washington. In the book he recalls Team Obama's shock when the president found it was facing "monolithic" Republican opposition to his agenda, rather than the bipartisan support they had "naively" expected as the economy stood on the brink of a depression. "Maybe this was what Hillary was talking about when she chided us during the campaign for raising 'false hopes'," he writes.

Even if no candidate can run on "Hope and Change" this time, that does not make "I Told You So" a winning slogan. At the core of the 2008 Obama insurgency was a belief that being a "very capable" Democrat was not enough to win the presidency. Mrs Clinton, with whom Mr Axelrod had worked in the past, was skilled at serving up Republican-bashing red meat, boasting in one primary debate: “If you want a winner who knows how to take them on, I’m your girl.” But many voters had decided that it was not just Republicans, but politics that was broken. Mr Axelrod writes: “The change she was offering was not away from Washington’s habit of parsing words and passing on tough issues (She habitually sought safe harbour).” Nor was she willing to break with a system full of lobbyists and deep-pocketed political action committees, he adds. “The only real change she was offering was in political parties, and that simply wasn’t enough.”

This time Mrs Clinton faces no serious rivals for the Democratic crown, even before she announces her intentions. But pondering Mrs Clinton’s vulnerabilities in a 2006 memo, Mr Axelrod wrote: “For all her advantages, she is not a healing figure...After two decades of the Bush-Clinton saga, making herself the candidate of the future will be a challenge.” Even if the country is more resigned to partisanship than in 2008, that is still true.

America's Pakistan Dilemma (The Diplomat)

By Sarah Graham

February 12, 2015

The Diplomat

One of the few remarked-upon passages in Hillary Clinton's otherwise unenlightening Hard Choices was her recollection of the decision not to inform Pakistani authorities of the U.S. raid to kill Osama bin Laden. In her retelling, the suggestion that the U.S. should tend to the diplomatic sensitivities of its ally was summarily dismissed by the most senior officials in the room. This would pose too great an operational risk given the known links between the Pakistani military and terrorist organizations such as Al Qaeda and the Taliban, even, scarily, at the risk that Pakistani authorities might mistake the U.S. incursion for a fully-fledged military attack by someone else.

So well known are these terrorist connections, in fact, that sponsorship of terrorism by various elements of the Pakistani state has its own Wikipedia page, and analysts consider the use of terrorist groups as proxies to be an established operating principle of Pakistani foreign policy. Among senior U.S. officials since 2001, Clinton has been the most willing to openly discuss the contradictions in U.S. policy. She coined the memorable phrase "snakes in the backyard" to describe the impunity with which militants operate in Pakistan's northwestern provinces. John Kerry has taken a much softer approach. His visits to Pakistan have been accompanied by lavish promises of aid and a generally polite glossing over of the strategic contradictions in one of Washington's most complicated diplomatic relationships.

Ensnared by History

Like Gulliver, the U.S. is ensnared by its history with Pakistan and the flawed logic behind decades of strategic involvement of the region. Despite its great power and wealth, Washington has only limited means of influencing Pakistan, and few viable options for rethinking its current policy in the short term. This is not a new problem for the U.S. At relatively few points in history do we see a really clear convergence of strategic interests between Pakistan and the U.S., and it is the U.S. that tends not to get the better side of the bargain. Though the stakes have rarely been higher, Washington is continuing in a sort of policy paralysis, leaving other players to exercise a decisive influence on the stability of the region.

Take U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry's announcement last month that the United States would provide an additional $250 million in humanitarian aid. This joins about $26 billion in total assistance – military, economic and humanitarian, but most of it military – since 2001, which now works out to about $1.5 billion annually after peaking at $2 billion in 2010. These astronomical sums have so far been insufficient to substantially influence Pakistan's behavior in the direction the U.S. wants. Kerry announced the disbursement after months of Pakistani military operations against Al Qaeda and the Pakistani Taliban in Waziristan. The government had effectively ceded control of the border province to the Pakistani Taliban in 2006. As the shocking killing of 150 schoolchildren in the province in December indicates, militant operations have not been completely disrupted, and many worry that the despite (or because of) the latest outrage a real commitment to do so is still a long way off.

But if the $250 million in humanitarian assistance was intended as a reward for credible action on the anti-terrorism agenda, then the unintentional signal of giving this relatively small sum is that most American aid is actually not contingent on Pakistan supporting the U.S. in its core strategic objectives in the region: combatting terror and promoting stable governance. And humanitarian assistance might not be the best lever on the highest echelons of the military that are unaccountable to the people, and that benefit most from U.S. military aid. In fact, the only credible pressure that has been exerted on the Pakistani military in the past few years seems to have been from the Taliban.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Time will tell how effective and committed Pakistani military action against the Pakistani Taliban will be, and whether new groups with the tacit or active support of Pakistani officialdom will fill the vacuum it leaves. There has been a long tradition in Pakistan of this kind of selectivity. The Haqqani network – worryingly, one of the most globally "connected" terrorist organizations in the region – is perhaps the most notorious player that evidently enjoys official impunity. Despite the U.S. expressing many times its wish to see the Haqqani network outlawed, Pakistan has only just designated it a banned organization, and many observers fear it will continue to operate freely despite that designation. The Islamic State also has South Asia in its sights, ensuring that the Pakistani military's ambivalence in the fight against terror, the ongoing flow of U.S. aid, and the suffering of local populations are set to continue.

Kerry has long been an advocate for humanitarian aid as a means to combat terrorism by enhanced development and supporting civilian institutions. As a senator in 2009 he sponsored a bill authorizing a much-expanded civilian aid program for Pakistan. The humanitarian help is badly needed, but it is wrong to expect it will be decisive for the U.S. counterterrorism agenda. "Carrots" are ultimately ineffective without "sticks," and the United States is too constrained by its current obligations to offer any credible disincentives to Pakistan's "double game." The United States has given so much aid to Pakistan over the years that it must come up with ever more astronomical sums to impress the Pakistani leadership with sufficiently enticing "carrots." If we recall the economic concept of marginal utility, then it is hardly unexpected that the "return" in the form of purchased loyalty on each additional dollar the United States gives is diminishing.

Drone Strikes

In place of the viable military effort on Pakistan's part that the U.S. has hoped for, Washington has depended instead on its own drone strikes program to pursue counterterrorism operations. However, drone strikes are deeply controversial, damaging to America's reputation, and prod some local populations towards terrorism. Nor can drone strikes solve the problems that make joining or supporting Islamist militants attractive to local publics. Only a real commitment by the Pakistani military and government, one that involves a well-crafted civil-military strategy, and then economic development, can achieve this.

The history of U.S.-Pakistani relations shows that Pakistani and U.S. strategic objectives have been in alignment on very few occasions. The prevailing wisdom is that Pakistan was a solid supporter of Washington's interests during the Cold War, but in fact it did so only up to a point and for reasons of its own. In 1954 the U.S. pursued a strategic alliance with Pakistan in the hope that, as a newly independent and Muslim-majority state, engagement with Pakistan could act as a bridge to a multilateral strategic alliance in the Middle East.

This constituted a fundamental misreading of Pakistan's core strategic concerns on Washington's part – its prime strategic focus was not the Middle East, but rather South Asia and its rivalry with India. In the end Washington cobbled together Mideast and Southeast Asian treaty frameworks, with Pakistan in both, but neither provided much more than symbolic value to U.S. interests during the Cold War. Meanwhile, U.S. military aid to Pakistan was profoundly important in stoking Indo-Pakistani tensions and alienating India from the United States.

This was precisely why Pakistan had courted the U.S. as a military backer since its earliest days as an independent state (it also forced Eisenhower's announcement of a not-yet-finalized deal by leaking details of it to the U.S. press). While India's vocal, non-aligned status was politically vexatious to the United States, Washington had no strategic interest in jeopardizing Indian security. As the largest non-Communist, democratic state in Asia, Washington had a stake in seeing India stable even if it was non-aligned. Thus, while Pakistan had some utility to U.S. Cold War objectives, they were never one and the same. Washington's failure here was in being too quick to dismiss the difference between its own strategic interests and Pakistan's actual strategic interests.

The 1960s and 70s offer similar examples. JFK entered office determined to tilt to India for the sake of cultivating warmer ties with the non-aligned bloc. Pakistan threatened to pursue military aid from China in retaliation, and eventually did so in 1966. There has been good deal of attention recently to the Pakistan-Bangladesh war of 1971 and Nixon and Kissinger's shameful role in it. Despite warnings that genocide was occurring, Nixon continued to offer diplomatic and the possibility of military support to Pakistan.

The striking thing about the archival record of Nixon's policies is the extent to which the U.S. administration felt it had no leverage to exert over Pakistan after being so committed for so long. The U.S. interest in South Asia was in a stable region outside the Communist sphere of influence, yet the repercussions of 1971 would seek an Indian treaty of "friendship" with the USSR and ongoing military ties between China and Pakistan (which were, admittedly, less worrisome with the opening of U.S. diplomatic relations), and nuclearization. Pakistan had enjoyed a privileged status as a Cold War ally and China was waiting in the wings to extend its influence – even had Nixon been more moved by the humanitarian implications of the events in Bangladesh, he would have needed to consider what opposing Pakistan's crackdown and dropping its ally might mean for the credibility of U.S. grand strategy.

The roots of the present problem of Islamist terrorism lie with the U.S.-backed Mujahideen forces that Pakistan hosted and trained during the Soviet invasion of the 1980s. It seems to be only here that we can find a deep alignment of U.S. and Pakistani interests. Yet the legacy of this phase of U.S.-Pakistani cooperation is as brutal as it is well known. Its effects pose a devilish irony: Washington has expended its blood and treasure to establish a post-conflict government in Afghanistan that seems to be interested in stability and combatting terror. Yet the flow of aid from the United States to Pakistan depends on the ongoing cross-border insurgency, and Pakistan has a vested interest in this continuing.

'Strategic Depth'

Hillary Clinton has criticized the notion that Pakistan should pursue "strategic depth" in Afghanistan. What she acknowledged here was the fact that Pakistan has traditionally favored a weak government in Afghanistan, most especially one that India can't influence. India, on the other hand, regards Afghanistan as a natural ally and has recently committed substantial sums to rebuild Afghanistan. We thus find that it is India's interests, and not Pakistan's, that are in alignment with Washington's. As the U.S. seeks a stronger relationship with India, the threat to India from Islamist terrorism has proven an ongoing irritant. India took exception, in fact, to Kerry's aid deal as a stamp of approval of Pakistan's military efforts against the Taliban. A Ministry of External Affairs spokesman alleged that Pakistan has done very little of substance to disrupt terrorism, and other analysts see merit in that assessment.

Other longstanding American national interests are undermined by its aid relationship with Pakistan. Pakistan is considered the most likely country in the world to proliferate nuclear weapons. Behind closed doors U.S. officials must be painfully aware of their limited ability to deter Pakistan from undesired behavior, particularly given that the transfer of sensitive information or materials could be accomplished in relative secret and by relatively few individuals.

Another key U.S. interest in the region is in strengthening democracy, yet in Pakistan democracy is chronically fragile precisely because the military has long seen itself as the arbiter of government, and the military benefits most from the relationship with the U.S. In September last year, and capitalizing on high poverty rates, weak and failing institutions, poor infrastructure and tribal tensions, the military flexed its muscles over the civilian government by orchestrating a month of mass demonstrations designed to destabilize Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif. This raised the specter of the fourth outright military coup in Pakistan's history. If humanitarian aid of the kind Kerry announced is the lever with which to influence Pakistani policy, the U.S. must consider what the vastly larger sums it gives in military assistance really does to the balance between civilian and military power inside the country.

Nor has U.S. civilian aid seemed to make much of a dent in the Pakistani poverty rate, which hovers at 20 percent according to the UNDP. While the Pakistani government claims the cost of conflict to Pakistan since 2001 to be in the order of $100 billion (or half its current GDP), the capacity for foreign aid to bridge the gap and act as a stimulus to balanced economic development is limited. Hence, boosting civilian aid probably isn't going to directly influence those who are playing Pakistan's "double game" and is unlikely to create the conditions for change from underneath their feet.

In the wake of the school massacre, the Pakistani government asserted that it would no longer discriminate between "good" and "bad" terrorists in its counter-terrorism efforts. Time will tell if the outrage leads to a fundamental change of position for the Pakistani military. What is true is that a matter of significance to U.S. regional strategy is still largely out of Washington's control. If she becomes president, Clinton will confront the longstanding dilemma that dropping Pakistan will make a bad situation worse. As the Afghani government strengthens, the U.S. will seek to wind back its commitments to Pakistan, and Clinton is probably well placed to manage that process since her tough talk already conveys a resolve to do so. Can the U.S. get out of its unrewarding friendship for good? Probably not, but it should be considering all possible options. After all, Pakistan's acknowledgment that terrorists can be "good" as well as "bad" was a very frank admission about what its real position has been – an admission that U.S. officials, in the traditional tactful mode, let slide.

Joe Lieberman Interviewed, Presses War Option With Iran, Notes Position on Mortgage Banks
(MSNBC 07-16-08)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: How difficult has it been for you to work with the Democratic Party, to feel a kinship with the Democratic Party and get to the point where you are right now where some Democrats say 'Oh he's not loyal and if he goes to the Republican National Convention, he's a traitor.' Just personally, not politically, does that hurt? […]

JOE LIEBERMAN: Sure it does all the conflict of the 2006 Democratic primary campaign were basically, people were against me because of one issue. I understand its Iraq, it's important, its not the way the party has been most of the time. But my relations with my colleagues in the Democratic caucus are pretty good. We work together, we get things done. I work with people on all sides ideologically and life goes on. But I feel I was reelected as an Independent. I made two big promises to people in Connecticut. I try to what was right and best for them and I'd always work across party lines to get things done for them and for the country and that's what I'm trying to do and I'm going to let the politics take care of itself.

MIKE BARNICLE: Do you, Senator, ever feel resentment towards people in your own party who you stood with them in many fights across the past couple of decades and now they walk away from you in 2006. What has happened to you in the Senate caucus? Did you have stronger friendships with say a Chris Dodd before 2006? Do you go out to dinner with them?

LIEBERMAN: You know I have a good record on the environment, but this isn't an alge tide. Every expericne you have - and that was a disappointing one in 06 - is part of me. Chris Dodd, Joe Biden, they have been friends for decades and they remain good friends. My argument is really not just to the Democratic Party but both parties. They may be ferocious on one or two parties but won't work with anybody they happen to disagree with. Frankly this is part of one or two issues. Frankly is part of the reason I'm supporting John McCain. A guy that has consistently said Ted Kennedy I don't agree with you on nine out of ten issues but I agree with this one and I'm going to work with you to get it. We've got to get back to particularly on the crisis we have and particularly right here at home with the economy. So, to me, the parties have gone off the track. And as a result, the country has gone off the track. And I think that's a big part of why the American people have lost confidence in their government and we've got to get it back.

HAROLD FORD: We're learning this morning that some in the Senate, including Senator Dodd, Senator Shelby, have concerns about the so-called bailout of Freddie and Fanny that the assistance, government assistance. And two, what are Senator McCain's thoughts on that? It's good to see you. You know I don't agree with your choice of President but you know you're my friend. So your thoughts on both of those issues?

LIEBERMAN: It's mutual my friend, you're the kind of Democrat we need more of. So we may not agree on a choice of a candidate but we're always going to work together because we know we agree on more things than we don't. My understanding of Freddie and Fanny Mac is that they're basically solid. But these days, sometimes the reality can be overtaken by the psychology. And the psychology here is very bad. And there's a danger of a panic. So I think the moves that Secretary Paulson and Chairman Bernanke have recommended to strengthen Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac are critically important. These people hold trillions of dollars in mortgages. If the panic continues and really takes them down, whether it's justified or not, it'll have a big affect on mortgage rates, probably not only on our economy but the global economy. Now, look, Chris Dodd and Rick Shelby, they may have some specific concerns about parts of the proposals. But I don't think either one of them is going to stop us from reassuring the public that we're going to stand behind these two critically important institutions. And my understanding is that's generally the position that John McCain has taken. We can't afford the psychology to become panic and to lead to, at worst, a collapse of Fannie Mae or Freddie Mac. Can't let it happen.

SCARBOROUGH: Mike?

BARNICLE: Senator, then, let me ask you -- Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac, I mean, they're basically tied to the government at one level. And yet they're going to be bailed out by taxpayers. You're going to be sitting there looking at whatever proposal comes before you. And they're both entities where the heads of these entities and many people up top of these entities are making millions and millions of dollars in salary each year.
So how is it that we take our public money, taxpayer money, and bail out basically something that has something to do with government? I mean, why aren't these people being paid like a GS-13 salary, like a Yosemite Park park ranger? What's going on here?

LIEBERMAN: You know, I love that -- you know, I was just thinking as you were talking, Mike, you're the voice of probably a guy in South Boston who's name is Freddie Mac...

BRZEZINSKI: Yes, so true.

LIEBERMAN: about Freddie Mac. Right. So, look, I think what we're talking about here is guarantees in case these two entities fall. But you're right, if the guarantees have to be implemented and its taxpayer dollars in there, that's got to come with conditions.
And I don't know that we can pay them like we pay a normal civil servant because they these are big trillion-dollar operations. But we're going to have a right on behalf of the taxpayers to go in there and set some limits on the salaries the that executives of these two institutions have. I've looked at them and they're outrageous.

FORD: Can I ask one last question senator -- with Ambassador Holbrook having been here this morning. He talked about Iran. He talked about your candidate's position being to the right of that of President Bush; that if indeed that McCain would be willing to go to war with Iran and he's willing to remove Russia from the G-8.
What are your thoughts? And how does the campaign answer those assertions?

LIEBERMAN: Well, look, John McCain is a great internationalist, not just on -- not as a foreign policy but on trade. Incidentally, if some of the proposals that Senator Obama has made for not supporting trade agreements or going back to protectionism ever were passed, I'm afraid it would send this economy of ours into a deep recession, maybe even worse. Because exports today are probably the most significant growth factor in our economy. But, look, John McCain is always going to know when to be tough and when to be accommodating. And I think he has a very clear opinion which I share, that when you're dealing with a fanatical regime like the one in Tehran, that leads the masses in shouting death to America and talks about blowing up Israel, that the only way you're going to get them to the peace table is to make sure that they know that if they're not reasonable, they're going to suffer. And I think that's the way we get to peace. The best way to achieve peace sometimes is to prepare for war. But John McCain will secure a peaceful world as president, because he's strong.

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: OK, Senator JoeLieberman. Always good to see you.

LIEBERMAN: Good to see you again.

Lieberman Refuses to Admit that Afghanistan is the Central Front in the War on Terror (CNN 07/16/08 08:29am)
JOHN ROBERTS: Where is the central front in the war on terror?

JOE LIEBERMAN: Well I think the enemy ought to have a lot to say about that. The fact is that Osama Bin Laden has made it very clear that the central front in the war on terrorism is in Iraq. That's why it's so critical that we are doing so much better thanks in a large part to John McCain's guts in saying that what the Bush administration was doing there wasn't working, and that led to the surge which is now working.

ROBERTS: So if in fact Iraq is still the central front in the war on terror how do you explain that Afghanistan has become deadlier for US forces, and now even John McCain says 3 extra brigades are urgently needed to fight the war in Afghanistan?

LIEBERMAN: Well the two are not inconsistent. Well I think about WWII. Senator Obama has taken a position that we have to lose, that we have to retreat and lose in Iraq to win in Afghanistan. We don't have that luxury; we have to win in both places. […] What's worked in Iraq, which is the surge that John McCain advocated so courageously, shows us the way to win now in Afghanistan. […] We've got to respond, like Senator McCain said yesterday, with the same kind of comprehensive military, economic, diplomatic surge. […]

ROBERTS: But you're resisting this notion that the central front in the war on terror has shifted to Afghanistan?

LIEBERMAN: I am. But I'll say that the active battlefront may be shifting to Afghanistan because we've succeeded in Iraq. […]
ROBERTS: You know what critics are saying, critics are saying that the central front on terror has not shifted to Afghanistan because of success in Iraq. Critics are saying that because President Bush went into Iraq, he took his eye off the ball in Afghanistan and allowed the Taliban, allowed Al Qaeda to regroup.

LEIBERMAN: […] Look you can argue whether it was right to go into Iraq or not. […] But we're there, and once we are there we've got to win it. And that's what John McCain understood. […]

Lieberman Comments on Obama's Flip Flops on Iraq and How John McCain Can Win in Iraq and Afghanistan (FNC 07/16/08 08:42am)

STEVE DOOCY: […] Have you taken a pad and pencil and figured out how many times Barack Obama has actually flip-flopped on Iraq?

JOE LIEBERMAN: it's a real serious question because it seems to me this is not just kind of normal political flip-flop back and forth, but really the judgment here is who do we want of these two people, John McCain or Barack Obama, to be president, to be commander in chief, and to shade your position based on the time, apparently of the campaign. […] But now I think he got such a reaction against that from moveon.org and a lot of people in the antiwar left of the democratic party that yesterday the speech he gave basically said the same thing, and though I respect him for coming back finally to where he was and what I think he believes, I think it's terribly wrong because it doesn't acknowledge, one, that we're winning, and we are withdrawing troops now based on our success there.

DOOCY: absolutely.

LIEBERMAN: But, two, it's just not what we want in a president. He's going to Iraq, but he's already decided his position. He's not going to listen to Petraeus or our troops, he's not going to listen to his own eyes with what he sees there, and I think that's not the kind of leadership we need in the oval office know.

DAVE BRIGGS: I don't know if you've read this quote from Senator Joe Biden, but I want to get your reaction to it. It reads "if John McCain wants to know where the bad guys live, come back with me to Afghanistan. We know where they reside, and it's not in Iraq". Your reaction to this quote from Senator Joe Biden?

LIEBERMAN: I love Joe Biden, he's a really good friend, but absolutely wrong, and really Joe Biden should retract that comment o of respect. The troops have died there fighting the bad guys. Osama Bin Laden said that Iraq is the central battlefront in the war against terror. […] We've got Al Qaeda on the run, and we're about to score a great victory. In fact, that's part of why the action is now moving to Afghanistan. And look, if anybody knows how to within the war in Afghanistan, it's John McCain advised by generals like David Petraeus. […] Obama seems to be saying you've got to lose the war in Iraq to win the war in Afghanistan, but you can't choose your battlefronts here. This is as if Roosevelt said during world war II, all we can do is try to defeat the Japanese and Asia pacific region, we're going to forget about the Nazis in Europe. You can't do that then, and you can't do it today.

Matt Lauer Interviews Graham, Biden; Graham Emphasizes McCain Surge Position (NBC 07/16/08)
MATT LAUER: What is the most glaring difference in the approach these two men will take?

LINDSEY GRAHAM: Well I think it is to how the war is to be prosecuted. When Senator Obama says Iraq is not a central battle in the war on terror. That is a huge difference between him and Senator McCain. General Petraeus said in April that for al-Qaeda, Iraq is their central battle front. If we lost in Iraq, al-Qaeda would claim victory, Iran would have be emboldened, so the idea that a failed state in Iraq would not effect the war in terror in general is a huge difference. John understood that is why he risked his career on the surge to make sure we wouldn't lose.

BIDEN: […] This is about being commander in chief of US interests around the world.

LAUER: What now is the definition of victory? Is it an end of violence, the insurgency, is it a victory on the war on terror? What do you see as victory?

GRAHAM: Victory would be a stable government that we left behind. History will not judge us not by when we left Iraq, but what we left behind. From the national security perspective, from an American view, victory is a stable functioning government where the people in Iraq live under the rule of law, al-Qaeda has no safe haven and they contain Iranian ambitions in the region. A stable, functioning government allied with us on the war on terror- the biggest victory coming out of the war in Iraq is that Muslims, with out help, took up arms against al-Qaeda sympathizers. Any time a Muslim fight al-Qaeda agents and sympathizers, we're safer. That's what happened from the surge.

GRAHAM: We've already had meetings with Iranian officials. Ambassador Crocker met with them. I want to meet, I don't want my President to sit down with Ahmadinejad without any preconditions and elevate him. That's terrible.

The McCain Family Beer Business may Cause Conflicts in Interest if John McCain Becomes President (CNN 07/16/08 07:32am)
JOHN ROBERTS: Despite John McCain's high profile job and the even higher profile job that he is after, Cindy McCain will also be the big bread winner in that family. David Mattingly explains why her beer business could be a problem for her husband if he's elected.

DAVID MATTINGLY: Fair to say that Cindy McCain is not only the wife to Senator John McCain; she's also his meal ticket. Her reported 2006 income of more than 6 million dollars exceeded her husband's earnings 16 times over. That money pays for a wealthy lifestyle of high-end condos, an Arizona ranch, flying in a corporate jet, and more.

KEN VOGEL: He wouldn't be able to afford that if it weren't for her. Politically, he's in Congress arguably because her company and her well funded his first congressional campaign and has certainly been helpful in subsidizing his presidential campaign.

MATTINGLY: It's a lifestyle built on beer. Cindy McCain is the chairman of one of the largest Anheuser Busch distributors in the country. A company founded by her father with a value estimated at over $100 million. In congress Senator McCain has been able to avoid a conflict of interest by staying out of the family business and recuse himself from beer related issues. But critics of that industry doubt that a President McCain would be able to stay so hands off.

BRUCE LIVINGSTON: It would not be possible. The Hensley Corporation, which Cindy McCain is an owner of, has lobbied ten times in the last 8 years on various issues that have gone to congress and executive branch agencies.

MATTINGLY: As President, McCain would run a mammoth bureaucracy with regulatory controls over alcohol sales, distribution and consumption. The next administration would probably have to deal with issues of beer taxes, labeling, maybe even the politically sensitive merger just announced involving the giant Anheuser Busch. These are all issues that could cause a conflict because they could have an impact on the McCain family bottom line. Though she does not run the day to day operations, Cindy McCain's Hensley and company website links to a news letter calling for a roll back in the federal beer tax. And this 2005 letter posted on the Internet by the Los Angeles Times, shows company executive Andrew McCain, yes that is the Senator's son, lobbying against a federal beer-labeling proposal.

ROBERTS: Hensley and company sold more than 23 million cases of Anheuser-Busch beer last year. Making it the third largest Anheuser distributer in the United States. We should also mention that Hensley also distributes Stella Artois, Bass and other beers produced by InBev, which recently bought Anheuser-Busch.

Body Language Expert Dissects John And Cindy McCain (NBC 07/16/08)
ANN CURRY: There's a photo of him covering his eyes. Now it looks like he's embarrassed, something just happened.

JOE NAVARRO, BODY LANGUAGE EXPERT: And we do that all the time. One of the things we do is when he does it, Tiger Woods does it, I do it, you do it, you see here something or you do something that's just not right and you cover your eyes. This is so powerful that even children who are born blind, when they don't hear things that they don't like, they will actually sometimes cover their eyes.

CURRY: So your saying there's something in our brain. We're born with- these are not learned cues all of them. Your saying this is-fundamental. Why?

NAVARRO: Exactly. Millions of years of- I think it's part of the way the brain protects itself. This is part of our paleocircuitry that protects us from things that may harm us. So we block things we don't like.

CURRY: Embarrassment included.

NAVARRO: Embarrassment included.

CURRY: In an interview I did with Cindy McCain, John's wife, you say I apparently asked her an uncomfortable question. Well actually-

NAVARRO: This is with her husband. What you see here-

CURRY: No, actually this one. I'm sorry. So what is it about her physicality?

NAVARRO: Well you see her. She closed her eyes and she delayed. She closed her eyes and delayed opening her eyes which really means she didn't like the question you asked and I believe it was a question about her husband's age. And not that there's anything wrong with that. Maybe it's a question that's too often asked of her. She definitely didn't like it.

CURRY: Now to the photograph of the two of them together. Your saying compared to that you can see the photograph that's she much more relaxed. Right and one of the ways we know it's a true smile is the facial muscles are relaxed but notice how the corners tend to go up above the ear not towards the ear. A fake smile what we do in public is towards the ear, a true smile above.

Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 08/19/08

Main Topics: Rick Warren, Frist & Jindal Surrogates, Civil Forum Debate, Atlanta Fundraiser Protests

Summary of Shift:
Heavy Vice Presidential nominee speculation ran rampant throughout all networks, ahead of Obama's expected announcement this week. A politico story claims McCain will make his announcement on the day following Obama's official nomination, August 29th, which also happens to be McCain's 72nd birthday. Obama's camp's cheating accusations against McCain at the Civil Forum on Saturday continue to draw speculation on the bias of the media towards Obama. The candidate's performance at the Civil Forum debate was another main topic of political discussion.
Tropical Storm Fay hits the Florida mainland today, with heavy attention to its heavy rains, flooding, and electricity outages covered. Pakistani President Musharraf's resignation draws discussion surrounding the fate of U.S.-Pakistan relations and the country's commitment to fighting extremists within it's borders and that of Afghanistan's. Afghanistan was also in the news due to a second day of Taliban suicide attacks against U.S. bases surrounding the country's independence holiday. Georgia and Russia began exchanging prisoners. Russia vows that it is pulling troops out of the country, but evidence of such is still unfounded. Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice is in Belgium for an emergency NATO meeting on the matter, promising that Russia will be punished for its actions. Olympic coverage continues.

Rick Warren Discusses McCain's Credibility In Light of Marriage Infidelity (ABC 08/18/08 10:00pm)
CYNTHIA MCFADDEN: Is it fair to say that in some ways this is a character test that you're giving these two men?

RICK WARREN: Well, I'm testing their character, I'm testing their convictions, I'm testing their confidence.

MCFADDEN: A religion test?

WARREN: No, absolutely not. I'm totally opposed to religious tests for the presidency. I think it's appropriate to know what a person believes, what their religion is, but I don't think that's the test for the presidency.

MCFADDEN: I've heard you say you want to understand what their personal relationship with Jesus is.

WARREN: Yes.

MCFADDEN: Does that mean a Jew or a Muslim would be out as far as you're concerned as president?

WARREN: Not at all. I can vote for a Jewish president easily. The only kind of president I don't think I could vote for is would be an atheist. I could not vote for an atheist president because I just think that's pretty arrogant. I think that the presidency is too big for any human individual. And I think we do need god.

MCFADDEN: McCain has had his own problems with the evangelical community. Most recently questions about whether he was faithful to his first wife. Let me be very specific with you. John McCain was divorced April 2 of 1980. He had actually filed for a wedding license March 6, a month earlier, of 1980. Sounds as if he had been involved with another woman before divorcing his wife. Is that a problem for you as you look at John McCain's candidacy for the presidency?

WARREN: All leadership is built on credibility. Leadership is built on trust. If you don't tell the truth, and I'm not just talking about in an affair, but in a lot of other areas, then you lose the right to lead. Now, is forgiveness possible? Yes. But there's a difference between forgiveness and trust.

MCFADDEN: Can you trust John McCain at this point?

WARREN: I think I can because of a consistent period since that time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCFADDEN: For Saturday's forum, Barack Obama won the coin toss and went first. But warren asked both men essentially the same questions on a wide range of topics. It was quickly clear they held wildly different views. […] Though the crowd gave both standing ovation, John McCain's answers clearly played better in the room. On Sunday, an NBC reporter claims people associated with Obama's campaign suggested that McCain may have had unfair access to Warren's questions. A charge both Warren and McCain deny. You know, there are some people who feel this a sham operation. That really we know you as an evangelical are a republican, a John McCain supporter. The numbers seem to support that, that most evangelicals overwhelmingly are registered as republicans and support john McCain.

WARREN: Well this is the first time I'll mention on the air, I'm not a registered republican or a democrat. I'm actually registered as an independent. So that might be the big surprise to America. The truth is, I think there are a significant number of people out there who are disillusioned and disenfranchised by both sides. I'm somewhere here in the middle and I would like to find and create a common ground for the common good.

MCFADDEN: But ultimately you've got to vote for one of them.

WARREN: Of course you do and that's going to have to be a personal choice. I'm a pastor, not a prophet. So I never predict who anybody else is going to vote for.

MCFADDEN: But he's more than willing to offer advice about how he hopes his parishioners will go about making their decisions. Yesterday's church service was entitled, the type of leadership America needs.

WARREN: Satan does not have any new ideas. The three basic traps that every leader falls into, money, sex and power.

MCFADDEN: The antidote to such sins, Warren believes can be found in the teachings of the Bible about integrity, generosity and humility and go to the candidate's character. He leaves it up to those in the pews to decide which candidate comes closest to sharing their view. And that will come as a surprise to some as issues like abortion have been seen as a litmus test for evangelical voters. Sunday afternoon, we talked to Rick Warren one last time about how he felt the session went.

WARREN: I was very surprised and pleased by how it came off. The fact that both of these men were able to totally explain their different views without attacking each other.

MCFADDEN: So on balance, how do you feel? Could you go into the voting booth and cast your ballot for either one of them?

WARREN: I never take sides, and I will tell you this. I'm for my friends and they both happen to be my friends.

MCFADDEN: Do you think at some point, Rick, you owe the people who look to you for guidance for more than that? I mean, at some point before this election are going to let up?

WARREN: No, and the reason why is I think they're smart enough on their own. I don't think anybody needs anybody else telling them who to vote for.

MCFADDEN: So if someone were to come to you and say, you know what? Forget character, I'm going to vote for the guy who is opposed to abortion. Would you say they need to go back and think harder?

WARREN: No. I would say you probably made your hierarchy of values and for you the value of preserving life is the top value. Great. Good decision.

Charlie Frist Discusses McCain's Genuineness When Speaking on Faith, And Need For Energy Independence (FNC 08/19/08 7:59am)
STEVE DOOCY: […] In the world of politics your name is frequently mentioned as perhaps a number two for John McCain. What do you make of the fact that it sounds like either Wednesday, Thursday, or Friday it sounds like Barack Obama is finally going to reveal who his number two is?

CHARLIE FRIST: Well, I guess the reality is eventually that decision has to be made, on both sides of the aisle, obviously. And talking about number two is not really a concern of mine. […]

GRETCHEN CARLSON: Will you comment at least on the event on Saturday night, when the two candidates got together and spoke at the civil forum at the Saddleback Church on Saturday? I'm sure that you saw at least parts of it. What was your opinion of how that went down? For me, it was a precursor of the debates that we are going to see later on this fall.

FRIST: Well I think that's probably accurate. Obviously I was very pleased with how Senator McCain did. His answers were straightforward, straight talk if you will, you know he just speaks from the heart and says what he believes in his soul. And when you see that communicated so forth rightly, it's hard not to admire, to respect, and care deeply about where he speaks and what he says and the sincerity and genuineness of his message.

DOOCY: Governor, also later on today your candidate John McCain is going to make a tour of an oil platform out in the Gulf of Mexico because he does support drilling for more oil in the outer continental shelf. Barack Obama has kind of modulated his answer. He said, well he's for it kinda. Is there a difference between his stand, Obama's, and McCain's?

FRIST: Well no question about it, Senator McCain is very forthright about the notion of being sure that we have sufficient domestic supply of oil so that we're not so dependent on foreign oil. As we all know, I think pretty well now, there's a transfer of wealth that's occurring, about 700 billion dollars a year that we're sending to the Middle East. Some of these people are people that don't like the United States very much. You know, when the founders created this country they signed a declaration. It was a declaration of independence not the declaration of dependence. We have to be independent. This is as much an economic issue as it is a national security issue. Senator McCain understands that. And he's understood it for a long time. And that's why I think he's taken this position to be sure that individual states have the opportunity or the right to make this call, rather than the Federal government suppressing our independence and so we got to move forward as a country. John McCain knows it, he gets it, and he understands it.

Bobby Jindal Talks McCain's Oil Rig Visit, Energy Needs, and McCain's Pro-Life Record (FNC 08/19/08 8:43am)
BOBBY JINDAL: I'll repeat what I've told you before. I've got the job that I won't. Won't be the nominee. Don't want to be the nominee. I'm certainly voting for Senator McCain, want to see him as President, think his policies on energy and cutting taxes are better for our country than Senator Obama's. But I'm going to support him as Governor, not as vice president.

STEVE DOOCY: Governor, tell us a little bit about what john McCain is going to do today on an oil rig out in the Gulf of Mexico.

JINDAL: At 10:00 central time he'll be out there on a Chevron platform, and the point of his trip is to demonstrate that our country needs to an embrace an all of the above strategy to our energy crisis. What we're doing now is crazy, not only with are we paying $3.70 or more per gallon, but we're also hurting our manufacturing base, given our high cost of energy. And what Senator McCain is doing today in Louisiana is emphasizing that we need to be drilling off our coast for oil and gas. It doesn't make sense to go and beg countries that are not friendly to us to produce more oil for us while we're not willing to drill ourselves. He's going to emphasize that drilling alone is not enough. We also need more coal, we need more nuclear energy, more conservation. Here's the crazy thing, Senator Obama has said he wants to raise taxes on coal and natural gas, he's said that nuclear energy is not the right answer for America. We need an all of the above approach. We need renewables, all of this needs to be part of breaking our dependence on foreign countries for energy. Our current policy makes no sense, in essence, we're borrowing money from China to pay countries that aren't always friendly to us for energy that's so important to our economy.

GRETCHEN CARLSON: And Senator McCain made that point at the civil forum on Saturday night. He also made the point about how he feels about being pro-life, but interestingly enough Governor, just a few days before, he kind of put a trial balloon out there in saying that he may choose a pro-choice V.P. How do you align those two things, because Rick Warren didn't ask a follow-up question, couldn't in his forum, although that was the question begging to be asked Saturday night.

JINDAL: Well, a couple of things. I'm certainly pro-life, and what is important to me is that Senator McCain himself is pro-life. He's got a pro-life voting record, he's committed his administration to be pro-life. Really the next President of the United States is going to have a tremendous influence through his appointment to the Supreme Court. One of the things we know about Senator Obama, his voting record, his rhetoric all suggest, you know, he's not for any type of restrictions. He said at the forum he was against late term abortions. He hasn't voted that way, however. What we know about Senator McCain that he's committed to having a pro-life administration. The most important thing that are going to be done by the next president on this issue, I believe, are going to be the appointments to the court. I'm looking for Supreme Court appointments that will actually read the constitution, not try to create law. Remember, this court gave us a 5-4 ruling striking down Louisiana's death penalty for child rapists. I'm not looking for another justice that's reading international laws, I'm not looking for another Justice that's looking at opinion polls. I want a Justice to read the constitution.

STEVE DOOCY: […] The McCain camp is angry that NBC may stand to the left. […]

GRETCHEN CARLSON: […] Andrea Mitchell at NBC reports that potentially the Obama campaign, a little miffed that they think McCain may have heard some of those questions. Why would they go out of their way, both camps, why would the Obama camp go out of their way to make a point of this? And number two, why would Andrea Mitchell report this?

BOB BECKEL: […] The Obama campaign should not have said anything here. Look, McCain had a good day. And if you're looking for a reason that he has a good day you don't want to leave the impression that some other guy cheated. That's not John McCain, that's not the way you think about John McCain. […]

DENNIS PRAGER: […] I think most people who are fair about this believe that most people in the media want Barack Obama to win. The question then that people will ask is does it effect their reporting? I think that it does. In this case, even if he did cheat and I don't believe for a second that he did, but even if he did, how do you explain how good he was in the second half of the debate? When he could not possibly have cheated?

McCain Interviewed By Local Atlanta News, Protesters Surrounding Fundraising Visit Highlighted (NBC-Atlanta, GA-11, 08/18/08 6:05pm)
DENIS O'HAYER: The price tag for this fundraiser at the Marquis is very similar to the ones for Senator Barack Obama's fundraiser earlier this summer. Just over a couple of thousand to get in, tens of thousands to get close. And Georgia is a state that Barack Obama could make close, according to John McCain. That is why he is promising that he will come back. Senator McCain told me he sees Georgia as a battleground state, but unlike his visit in February, this Georgia stop includes no public campaigning. He insisted that that does not mean he really sees this state as safe.

MCCAIN: I think we got a challenge here and I think we got to campaign here, and I look forward to it. It's a very important part of the nation.

O'HAYER: Is that why you mention John Lewis as one of your three wise people during your interview with Rick Warren?

MCCAIN: No, actually, I've had the honor of knowing John Lewis, who I know is a very dedicated member of the democratic party, but I've admired and respected him for many years.

O'HAYER: McCain is running t.v. ads here, highlighting among other things, energy. Lately, he's been insisting on an all-of-the-above energy plan that includes offshore oil drilling, something he previously opposed. He again attacked Democratic rival, Barack Obama's suggestion that conservation measures like better tire inflation will do more faster to lower oil prices.

MCCAIN: That's not the vision that Americans want, nor do they want him saying no to nuclear power which we have to have.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'HAYER: McCain said he would order conservation measures including hybrid vehicles for the government. But he said a McCain administration would not mandate conservation for consumers.

MCCAIN: Americans are conserving as we speak, in fact, one of the reasons why the price of a barrel of oil went down is because the President announced that we are going to lift the Federal moratorium on offshore drilling. But also because the demand has been reduced.

O'HAYER: And as we parted from our brief interview, Senator McCain shook my hand and said, I have to come back and campaign here. And we expect him sometime this Fall. […]

TED HALL: Anti-McCain demonstrators picketed and chanted at the hotel entrance during McCain's arrival today. […]

JON SHIREK: The anti-McCain demonstrators were from several groups that generally support democrats including labor unions such as AFL-CIO, and the teamsters, also anti-war groups were here. Organizations such as Iraq Vets Against the War. A retiree organization marched here against McCain and against a plan to privatize any part of social security. And the Democratic Party of Georgia blasted McCain saying that he swooped into Georgia simply to pick up some big checks from lobbyists and others at the private fundraiser and then left without campaign publicly.

JANE KIDD: Barack Obama understands the struggles of everyday Georgians, and when he's elected to the White House, he will be working for them. He won't owe lobbyists anything.

SHIREK: There were also a group of McCain supporters here, taking a stand in the midst of the Obama supporters. Georgia's Students for McCain, college students from all across Georgia.

Local Atlanta News Covers Interviews McCain On His Fundraiser and the Ralph Reed/Jack Abranoff Lobbying Scandal (NBC-Atlanta, GA-11, 08/18/08 7:05pm)
TED HALL: Republican Presidential candidate, John McCain with a quick stop here in Atlanta this afternoon. He was the star of a private campaign fundraiser here at the Marriot Marquis downtown. A lot of leading Georgia republicans paid thousands of dollars just to be there. But there was also some controversy about one Georgia republican who offered his help. […]

DENNIS O'HAYER: That one Georgia republican, Ralph Reed, the former head of the Christian Coalition who lost a primary fight for Lieutenant Governor two years ago. Many McCain supporters claim Reed was behind a whisper campaign that derailed McCain's 2000 presidential bid in the South Carolina primaries. Reed was also an associate of lobbyist, Jack Abranoff. Abranoff pled guilty in 2005 to Federal fraud charges in connection to a campaign involving Indian gambling casinos. John McCain chaired the Senate hearings into Abranoff's activities, but Reed was never even charged with wrong doing. On August 7th, Reed sent an email asking Georgia republicans to attend and contribute to McCain's fundraiser. Democrats pounced, charging McCain was violating his own standards. McCain said, Reed acted on his own.

MCCAIN: He's had nothing to do with our campaign. Any role, formal or informal. My understanding is that he sent out an email on his own, but I had no communication with him whatsoever since I condemned the whole Abranoff affair.

O'HAYER: There were reports that Reed told a Capitol Hill newspaper, McCain's Georgia Finance Chairman asked for his support. McCain said that's not true.

Did the campaign to your knowledge ask him to send out an email?

MCCAIN: I know the campaign did not.

HALL: Of course we want to point out that 11alive News did leave several messages with Ralph Reed to get his side of the story but so far he has not called us back. Outside the hotel, anti-McCain demonstrators chanted and marched. They protested McCain's positions on the war in Iraq, and privatizing part of social security. They also said McCain was in town to take campaign money from lobbyists with ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abranoff.

SEN. DAVID ADELMAN: Senator Obama has made a pledge to change the culture of corruption in Washington. John McCain today in Atlanta embraces the culture of corruption.

HALL: Some McCain supporters from across our state also demonstrated. They're with the group, Georgia Students for McCain.

Protesters Against McCain and Privatized Social Security Highlighted Surrounding Fundraiser in Atlanta (CBS-Atlanta-46 News 08/18/08 3:05pm)
STEPHANY FISHER: Republican presidential candidate, John McCain was in Atlanta tonight. But not everyone who showed up for the visit was there to support him.

PROTESTER: What America wants! What America needs! Talk About it! What America has got to have!

FISHER: Protesters gathered outside the Marriot Marquis where McCain's fundraiser was held. This group is upset with McCain over recent comments he made over social security. He called the system a disgrace and said it needs to be fixed.

Huma ,,,,Laura forwarded your enquiry to me.
It was an interview on Israeli TV in Hebrew,,,,,on the day she announced,,,,,,someone took my statement and translated it freely to English,and stated what THEY wanted to state NOT what I said.
Never said that she opposes the deal,,,said" I don't know and if I knew I couldn't say".....they took out the part that said "I don't know",,,kept the rest and then concluded that it's a hint that she opposes,,,,,baloney stuff.,,,,,
All questions that I am asked about policy I simply answer "I don't know",,,,,and I just praise her experience courage persistence tenacity etc,,,,no policy discussions.
The Hill needs to go the Hebrew lessons if they want to quote Hebrew interviews.

> Just minutes before Hillary Clinton announced her candidacy for the 2016 presidential election, Israeli Channel One News interviewed Haim Saban, an American-Israeli media magnate and long-time Clinton supporter. Noticeably excited, he explained that she had waited to make the announcement until she had carefully prepared the ground for her campaign.

Then came the big question: What is her position on the Iran deal?

ADVERTISEMENT

Saban responded carefully, “She will have to, at some stage, express her opinion. But we know that in essence and in every important matter, she is committed to the security of Israel. She is a friend of the State of Israel. And we've seen this over the past 25 to 30 years. So, there won't be any problems with relations between the United States and Israel when Hillary Clinton is president. No problem. On the contrary.”

But Ya’akov Ayalon, the host of the nightly Channel One news pressed on: And where does Hillary Clinton stand on this issue?

"I know where she stands but I can't talk about it," Saban admitted.

"Give me a hint," Ayalon had to ask.

"I hinted to you – that I know," Saban couldn’t repress a laugh. "But I can't reveal to you things that were said behind closed doors. She has an opinion, a very well-defined opinion. And in any case, everything that she thinks and everything she has done and will do will always be for the good of Israel. We don't need to worry about this.”

The implication: Clinton is against the Iran deal.

Why? Because Israelis – across the political spectrum – are against the deal, and Saban knows this. From the extreme left of Zionist parties and partisans to the extreme right, Israelis oppose the deal. For Haaretz reporter Ari Shavit, it’s President Obama’s big mistake. Former Prime Minister and head of the Labor Party Ehud Barak came right out and urged the United States to tell Iran to “dismantle or else .” Barak said, "The Pentagon and the forces of America under the backing and probable directive of the [US] president [could] create an extremely effective means to destroy the Iranian nuclear military program over a fraction of one night.” And as the former IDF Chief of General Staff and Israeli Minister of Defense, Barak might know a thing or two about this topic.

Barak is not alone. Israelis, across the political spectrum, want the military option on the table – on the negotiating table, where it belongs. The debate in Israel is not whether the deal is good. It’s whether Prime Minister Netanyahu is responsible for the bad deal – by spoiling Israel’s relations with the United States, or whether Obama is responsible for the bad deal by virtue of his unrealistic idealism and tendency to over-compromise.

So when Yaakov Ayalon says, “Give me a hint” and Haim Saban says “I hinted to you – that I know,” and just after he’s said “there won’t be any problems with relations between the United States and Israel when Hillary Clinton is president,” that means he is convinced that Hillary Clinton is against the Iran deal.

And this is big news. Israelis have been anxiously waiting for Hillary Clinton to openly state her position on the Iran deal. Congress is the last bastion of hope for Israel. Well before the P5+1 negotiations in Lausanne, Israeli news analysts focused intently on the Corker-Menendez bill. If Hillary Clinton comes out against the deal, more Democrats will join Republicans in demanding that Iran abandon its nuclear ambitions. And this is what Israelis, across the political spectrum, are praying for.

Outrageous. Destructive. Beneath contempt. Treason?

Those are the words being used to describe a letter sent by 47 Republican U.S. Senators to the government of Iran in an attempt to undermine negotiations over its nuclear program.

Our junior senator, Rob Portman, signed this letter. Tell Rob Portman right now to remove his name from the GOP's Iran letter.

We all know Washington is regularly mired in partisan gridlock, but this is different. By interfering with the diplomatic efforts of the United States and our allies to dismantle Iran's nuclear weapons program, Rob Portman is risking both American lives and the lives of millions of people in the Middle East--and all to score political points."

Send a message to Portman now: let our President do his job. Stop putting lives at risk. Stop embarrassing our country before the eyes of the entire world. Sign on now--and then ask your friends to do the same. We'll make sure Rob Portman gets the message loud and clear.

Sincerely,

Sandy Theis

TTP Will Undercut U.S. National Security

By Clyde Prestowitz

To persuade Congress to give him authority for concluding negotiation of a proposed Trans Pacific Partnership (TPP) free trade agreement, President Obama is emphasizing that such an undertaking is essential to national security.

The appeal to patriotism is always powerful, but in this instance it is being used as the last refuge of a weak economic argument.

The most optimistic estimates of potential U.S. economic gains from a TPP put them at only 1-3 percent of GDP in ten years. But experience suggests this forecast is wildly optimistic, and that while the agreement might be good for some global corporations it could well be a disaster for average citizens. The 2001 deal to bring China into the World Trade Organization was forecast dramatically to reduce the U.S. trade deficit while creating lots of new American jobs. In actuality, the trade deficit soared and millions of jobs were off-shored to China. Like the TPP, the 2012 U.S.-Korea free trade agreement was billed as a super modern deal that also would cut America's trade deficit while again creating lots of jobs. The reality has been the reverse of the forecast.

The president himself has acknowledged that previous deals didn't fulfill expectations, but is arguing that "this time will be different." Unfortunately, he doesn't say why except to label the TPP a "21st century" agreement.

In fact, it's a strange mishmash of old deals with a few new countries thrown in. U.S. free trade agreements with Canada, Mexico, Peru, Chile, Australia, and Singapore already exist. The additions of Brunei, New Zealand, Malaysia, and Viet Nam offer only small markets while much experience suggests low expectations are in order for any market opening by Japan. Oddly, despite the TPP label, the arrangement does not include most of the major Pacific countries like the Philippines, Korea, Indonesia, Thailand, and China. Indeed, of the roughly 750 million person population of the TPP countries, about 500 million are in the Americas. One wonders what the point is in view of the fact that the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) group, established largely at Washington's behest in 1989 and encompassing all of the Asia-Pacific countries including both China and Russia, is already committed to achieving free trade by 2020.

To go beyond this and become truly a 21st century agreement, the TPP would have to deal with the truly major issues of the global economy such as currency alignments. Having been the major cause of recent global economic crises, Global capital flows and exchange rate movements are far more important in today's international economy than flows of goods and services. Yet, the TPP doesn't mention currencies.

Without a good economic rationale, the White House and the U.S. foreign policy establishment are crying national security, saying that America must reassure its Asian allies of its commitment to them and that dangers would arise from China writing the trade rules of the future. Of course, it was only fifteen years ago that the same people were insisting it was a matter of national security to bring China into the WTO and make it a "responsible stakeholder in the global system."

While U.S. foreign policy experts now fret, it seems that America's Asian allies feel already see China as a responsible stakeholder and feel little need of reassurance. Even as they negotiate the TPP, they are already writing the future rules of trade with China by negotiating to join China's proposed Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership (RCEP), by rushing to become founding members of China's Asia Infrastructure Investment Bank, and by concluding bi-lateral free trade agreements such as those between Australia and China, and Singapore and China.

The truth is that the TPP is mostly a solution looking for a problem. It is the knee jerk, orthodox reaction of an outdated foreign policy elite to a misperceived threat in a world they no longer understand, if they ever did. In truth, the agreement itself may well be more of a risk to than a defense of U.S. national security.

Nashua Telegraph editorial: "Hillary, measured against the field"

By the Telegraph Editorial Board

January 6, 2015

Now that it's 2015, it's time to get serious about 2016, and for most Democrats that means saying a prayer that Hillary Clinton announces her presidential candidacy sooner rather than later.

Why? Because, considering the alternatives, she offers the party its best chance of retaining control of the White House until at least 2020. A quick scan of the alternatives proves that point.

By default, Vice President Joe Biden tops the list of possible Clinton challengers. No one is smarter, more knowledgeable or more experienced than Biden. But his "loose lips sink ships" reputation is a serious liability. There are people whose temperament suggests their talents are best served as a second banana or a foil to others. Biden is that kind of guy. While he has served President Barack Obama well, Biden has also had to apologize a time or two for off-the-cuff comments that embarrassed the administration. These blunders have undermined public confidence that he should be entrusted with being the most powerful and important leader in the world.

Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts is emerging as the moral equivalent of George McGovern. She's become the darling of liberal Democratic activists, particularly because of her hardline populist positions against Wall Street excesses. Warren preaches the political and financial systems are rigged against lower and middle class Americans and points to the ever-widening gap between the nation's rich and poor as proof. Where she comes up short is on foreign policy experience, which, as we have seen over the past six years, is an important requirement to serving as president. Add to that the simple fact that she's just too liberal for the country as a whole, and it's clear she's not someone Democrats want leading the ticket.

Speaking of being liberal, the next most recognizable name on the potential candidates list is Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders. The professed socialist is officially an independent, but he has said he might run for president as a Democrat. He hits on many of the same points as Warren but is viewed by most political observers as someone who seeks to influence the debate, rather than as a serious challenger for the nomination. If elected president, Sanders wouldn't take office until he was 75 years old.

The next big name on the list is New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo, who just won reelection. He is the son of former New York Gov. Mario Cuomo, whose decision not to run for president is viewed as helping thrust a then-little-known Arkansas governor named Bill Clinton into the spotlight. Cuomo can point to a Democratic friendly record on marriage equality, gun control and hydraulic fracturing, but he's also could face ethics problems because of his interference in a commission assigned to investigation corruption in his administration.

After that, there is an ever-changing list of virtual unknowns or has-beens whom Republicans would cheer if they were chosen to be the Democrats' standard bearer. Among that horde are outgoing Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb, Virginia Sen. Tim Kaine, Minnesota Sen. Amy Klobuchar, Illinois U.S. Rep. Luis Gutiérrez, West Virginia Sen. Joe Manchin and former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We could go on, but the point is clear. If Democrats want to take advantage of the disarray and divisions plaguing the Republican Party, they would be smart to unite behind their strongest candidate early and, just like four years ago, let the GOP beat itself to a pulp.

Winnipeg Free Press: "Tickets to see Clinton selling fast"

By Geoff Kirbyson

January 6, 2015, 3:00 a.m.

You're running out of chances to see the woman who could be the most powerful person in the world in a couple of years.

Tickets to see former U.S. secretary of state Hillary Clinton speak at the RBC Convention Centre WinnipegJan. 21 are more than 90 per cent sold out.

"Ticket sales have been great," said Christian Darbyshire, partner at Tinepublic, a Calgary-based events and communications company that's running the Clinton luncheon.

"We've just put some additional tickets out there."

This won't be your typical rubber-chicken meal, if for no other reason than a single seat costs $299.25, including taxes, and a table of 10 will set you back $2,992.50, also including taxes.

Clinton's 90-minute speech will be part of the Global Perspectives series, which is sponsored by CIBC.

Her schedule hasn't been finalized for her visit yet, but Darbyshire said he wasn't able to comment on when she gets in, where she'll be staying, who she'll be visiting or when she'll be leaving.

He also wasn't at liberty to discuss whether there would be members of the U.S. Secret Service on security detail while she's here, but it's entirely possible there will be more sunglasses-wearing men in dark suits talking into their shoulders than Winnipeg has ever seen.

Clinton is seen as a contender for the 2016 U.S. presidential race.

This won't be the first time Winnipeg has hosted a high-powered U.S. politician. Clinton's husband, former U.S. president Bill Clinton, spoke at a $1,100-per-plate dinner here in 2003 as well as another event at the Centennial Concert Hall.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Will Voters Choose the Nixon Candidate in 2016?"

By Stephen Sestanovich

January 5, 2015, 1:52 p.m. EST

With Jeb Bush and Mike Huckabee about to enter the 2016 presidential race, I'm reminded of a friend's joking prediction that next time around the American people may be looking for Richard Nixon. He meant that after a fling with more interesting leaders, the voters could decide on someone seasoned, predictable, and reliable–even someone they don't feel too good about. That was Nixon in 1968–a political figure long out of office, associated with a distant administration, his career seemingly over but able to make a comeback in hard times.

My friend made this prediction with Hillary Clinton in mind, and for all the differences between her and Nixon the comparison is revealing. The former senator and secretary of state has got a lot of baggage, and many people dread her return to politics, but no one can say she's unqualified. Clearly this same thought is tempting others to join the race. How else to explain the Mitt Romney boomlet of a few months back? Jeb Bush has many virtues, but he's basically a Nixonian candidate too. Just when you thought we'd gotten the Bushes out of our system, they're back. Remember the way people joked about Nixon's re-emergence in 1968? "Tanned, rested, and ready." That will, implicitly or not, be the Bush bumper sticker of 2016.

Both parties, of course, have a host of anti-Nixonian alternatives to choose from—candidates who can say to the electorate, Why go with someone tired and familiar when I offer you novelty and purpose? In addition to Mr. Huckabee, this group includes Rand Paul, Ted Cruz, Marco Rubio, Elizabeth Warren, and Al Franken. All of them surely rail at the idea of letting a pair of resume-heavy baby-boomer has-beens fight it out for the presidency.

Yes, there are similarities between today's national mood and the one that made Richard Nixon president in 1968. In 2016, the voters may again go for a candidate with whom they aren't really happy. Yet the anti-Nixonians should not despair. For more than half a century the American people have picked their presidents differently. They spurn the time-tested, qualified candidate, gambling on someone they know relatively little about–someone fresh, different, even inspiring. That's how Barack Obama became president. You could say the same of George W. Bush, Bill Clinton, Ronald Reagan, Jimmy Carter, and John Kennedy. We picked Nixon once. We don't do it often.

MSNBC: "Defining 'dynasties' down"

By Steve Benen

Frank Bruni asked over the weekend whether “two dynasties” compromise our political “destiny,” and given the way next year’s presidential race may shape up, the New York Times columnist is hardly the only one asking.

“Jeb and Hillary. Hillary and Jeb. It’s getting to the point where a mention of one yields a reference to the other, where they’re semantically inseparable, presidentially conjoined. […]

“We’re a country of self-invention (that’s the myth, at least) in thrall to legacies and in the grip of dynasties, riveted by the mightiest surname in modern Democratic politics and its Republican analogue, imagining not just a clash of the titans but a scrum of the successors.”

The premise is a little shaky. For example, I’m not sure if the former Florida governor and former Secretary of State are so inextricably linked – the former left public office nearly a decade ago, and during that time, the latter has served as a respected U.S. senator and the nation’s top diplomat, with a very competitive national candidacy in between.

They don’t enjoy similar status in their respective parties, either. In 2016 polling, Hillary Clinton enjoys overwhelming Democratic support, while Jeb Bush, who hasn’t run a successful campaign in over 12 years, has underwhelming GOP backing, trailing Mitt Romney in every national poll that includes both of their names.

But more important is this notion of “dynasties.” Obviously, the prospect of a Bush and/or a Clinton seeking the presidency is going to lead to chatter about their familiar last names, but I’m not sure the parallels line up as neatly as many pundits want to believe.

Consider:

Jeb Bush is the grandson of a senator, the son of a president, and the brother of another president.

Hillary Clinton is the wife of a president.

Sure, one can argue that Clinton benefits from the association, but the whole point of a political “dynasty” is the inheritance – some are born into powerful families, and they parlay that status to advance their public-service ambitions.

That’s not a criticism – I’m not making a value judgment about dynasties – but neither Bill nor Hillary Clinton inherited much of anything in the way of political power and influence from their families. Jeb, on the other hand, has a very different background.

That’s not necessarily a bad thing, and there have been some important familial political dynasties in American history, which have contributed a great deal to the country. But there’s a qualitative difference between Bush and Clinton is this area and it’s probably best not to lump them together too quickly.

Postscript: George P. Bush, Jeb’s son, recently became Texas’ land commissioner. He’s the beneficiary of a legacy in ways with no modern parallel.

New York Times opinion: Keith Boykin, Clinton White House aide: “Not All Political Dynasties Are Equal”

By Keith Boykin

January 5, 2015

I was fresh out of law school in 1992 when I put a new job on hold and drove my old car from San Francisco to Little Rock to work on Bill Clinton's presidential campaign. It was an exciting generational conflict, pitting a charming 46-year-old governor against a 68-year-old president.

A 2016 rematch of these two marquee names would provide none of the generational tension, as a 63-year-old Jeb Bush faces a 69-year-old Hillary Clinton, but it would provide an exciting gender option.

Political dynasties are inevitable. A few names have prominently shaped American presidential politics: Adams, Roosevelt, Kennedy, Bush and Clinton. Where you stand on these political dynasties often depends on where you stand politically. As a child, I swooned over Ted Kennedy's liberal challenge to Jimmy Carter in 1980, and today I'm ready for Hillary in 2016, but I had no enthusiasm for George W. Bush's 2000 campaign and have none for his brother Jeb's impending challenge either.

But even Clinton and Bush loyalists, if they're being as honest as Barbara Bush was last year, have to admit the concentration of power in so few hands is not good for democracy.

The Clinton dynasty, however, comes with an important advantage over the Bush dynasty. The economy created 21 million private sector jobs when Hillary's husband was in the White House, which compares well to the 462,000 private sector jobs lost when Jeb's brother George was president.

Today Clinton's biggest appeal may be her gender. After eight years with the nation's first black president, many Americans are eager to elect another history-making candidate and won't be as excited about another old white guy (sorry Joe Biden).

Of course, I will gladly support a dynasty that adds diversity to the White House and advances my political agenda, but our democracy will be better off with new names on the ticket.

New York Times opinion: Dewey Square Group’s Mary Anne Marsh: “There Are Some Advantages to a Political Dynasty”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Mary Anne Marsh

January 5, 2015

Political dynasties are as old as America. The Adams, Roosevelts, Kennedys, Bushes and Clintons all have served in many offices including president.

While a famous name may get people's attention, open eyes, doors and wallets, it isn't a guarantee of success. Ultimately, every election is about trust. And you have to earn it. Voters want you to stand on your own two feet and make your case to earn their trust and their vote. The 2016 election is no different in this respect.

But it is in others. Voters may have the chance to choose between two dynasties. If Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton run for president, and win the nomination of their respective parties, voters will have a choice of individuals who know well what it is like to be president without ever holding the job.

That alone could be an advantage in this election. With the trust of institutions at an all-time low in public opinion, voting for someone who knows the job well may be an advantage in 2016. Voters won't focus on the dynastic aspect of their candidacies, but rather on the direction they want for the country and whom they trust to get the job done. Just like any other election.

Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton know their name is no guarantee of success. They have both lost elections before. If the 2016 election is Bush versus Clinton one of them will know what it is like to lose again -- and that makes a dynasty no different than any other candidate.

New York Times opinion: Doug Wead, senior advisor to Ron Paul: "Political Dynasties Are an Affront to American Tradition"

By Doug Wead

January 5, 2015

Political dynasties are a threat to democracy, corrupting the political marketplace and compromising the free exchange of ideas. The founding fathers warned against them and shunned all trappings of royalty.

One reason America has seen a rise in political family dynasties is that they have appeared in both political parties simultaneously, negating the natural political checks and balances.

No Republican will attack the Democrats for allowing the Clinton family dynasty because that would anger the Bush family in their own party. If public figures in the Democrat Party decry the dangers of the Bush dynasty they risk alienating the Clintons, whose support they must have to be successful. Thus both the Clintons and the Bushes escape criticism because of the other.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The national media, driven by profit, stay quiet in the face of dynastic claims because famous names sell.

But when Robert Todd Lincoln, son of the 16th president, was being promoted for the White House, Joseph Pulitzer opposed the idea vehemently in his New York World. “True democracy recognizes no claims of birth or name,” Pulitzer wrote. “The merits of the man, not the accident of his ancestry, should be the passport to positions of public trust under a republican government.” Pulitzer called the idea behind the promotion of Lincoln as “rotten Republicanism.”

The growing danger to our national security in Iraq and the exponential growth of Islamic terrorism can be seen as an unintended consequence of a president who was finishing family business with Saddam Hussein.

In the Middle Ages, a son would pick up his father's spear on the battlefield and finish the fight. But today’s spears have nuclear tips.

New York Times editorial: “Gov. Cuomo’s Expanded Horizons”

By The Editorial Board

January 5, 2015

Gov. Andrew Cuomo of New York gave a politically important speech last week that got lost in the news that his father, former Gov. Mario Cuomo, had died that same afternoon. The speech — his second inaugural address — touched on some of the high points of his first term while laying out an ambitious agenda for his next four years.

Mr. Cuomo asserted that he had tamed a dysfunctional state capital in his first four years in office. “We made the government work,” he said, adding that the “we” included both “Republicans and Democrats who put New York first and political parties second, even in this age of hyperpartisanship.”

While he acknowledged that more remained to be done to address education, ethical failure and other state problems, much of the speech seemed pitched to a wider audience. In tones and cadence that reminded many of his father, whose oratory made him a national political figure, Mr. Cuomo said that it is important to look beyond New York because “the most severe problems we face go beyond the borders of our state.”

These problems include economic inequality, which calls into question “the American promise itself”, as well as racial discrimination in education and in the administration of justice. He described “two education systems”, one for the rich, one for the poor, adding that public education had become “the great discriminator” in some communities. He warned that the American justice system needs review and reform, not just in New York City or even in Ferguson, Mo., but nationwide. At risk, he suggested, “are the primary democratic institutions of this country.”

Perhaps inevitably, the breadth of the speech raised questions about Mr. Cuomo’s longer-term ambitions. In his first term, the governor did not seek national attention. He stayed mostly inside the state until last year when he went to Israel, Afghanistan and Puerto Rico. He has publicly dismissed talk of presidential aspirations and said that if Hillary Rodham Clinton seeks the Democratic nomination, he would not.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But now he is reportedly planning to attend the annual gathering of financial and political bigwigs in Davos, Switzerland, later this month. And he has scheduled five international trade missions — China, Mexico, Canada, Israel and Italy. Those trips could help New York's economy. They could also help fill a gap in the résumé of an ambitious politician who needs foreign policy experience.

Politico blog: Dylan Byers on Media: "Van Susteren's Martin O'Malley conflict"

By Dylan Byers

January 5, 2015, 3:42 p.m. EST

Fox News host Greta Van Susteren appeared on ABC's "This Week" on Sunday and touted Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley as "the big sleeper candidate" of the 2016 presidential race.

What Van Susteren did not say is that her husband is a longtime O'Malley friend and a donor to the Democratic governor's political efforts. John P. Coale, a trial lawyer, has given $21,715 to O'Malley's "O'Say Can You See" PAC, which is dedicated to promoting O'Malley's record.

On Sunday's program, "This Week" host Martha Raddatz asked Van Susteren if there would be any suprises in the 2016 race.

"I actually think the big surprise is going to be the Democratic side of the ledger, whether or not former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton runs," Van Susteren said. "I'm actually not convinced -- I'm not convinced she's going to run and I think the big sleeper candidate is actually going to be Gov. Martin O'Malley of Maryland. I realize that the governorship was lost and that the Republicans in Maryland this last run that -- last run."

O'Malley has "been [to Iowa] a number of times. He's a knock-on-the-door type candidate.... So I think that he may be a sleeper," Van Susteren said.

As our colleague Ken Vogel recently reported, O'Malley's "O'Say Can You See" PAC paid $45,000 in the third quarter to a firm called Revolution Messaging "that created slick movie-trailer-style videos touting O'Malley's record" and $32,000 "on a pair of finance consultants who specialize in part on high-dollar fundraising." Coale's $21,715 mostly in-kind contributions went to transportation.

UPDATE (6:14 p.m.): Van Susteren responds on her blog, in part:

First, all I said was that I thought he is a sleeper candidate. I did not endorse him or say he was a good or bad candidate — just that I thought he might be running. Second, most know my husband is friends with O'Malley and has contributed to him in the past. My husband is from Baltimore, Maryland (where Gov O'Malley was Mayor) and has known O'Malley for years. My husband's relationship with O'Malley goes way back and it (and his contributions) have been in the media many times. By the way, my husband has also contributed to the Clintons over the years….and to Republicans, including Senator John McCain. I don't know what other contributions since frankly I don't go through my husband's checkbook and I also know all political donations are PUBLIC. I am sure he has made other donations but the public nature of political contributions means you can't be sneaky.

Third, it is MY husband, and not me. I am not divorcing because of the way he spends his money. :)

Hello All,
This is your tracker, Ryan, on the ground in Ohio now. Below are my notes from the event. Enjoy.

Big Highlights

* Palin - I guess you won't be supporting Barack the wealth spreader this election.

- McCain

o This week we learned that Obama's tax plan looks like welfare so he added an employment cause, 16 days before the election. He'll say anything to get elected. If you're unemployed you won't get anything at all.
o If Obama is elected, we'll have a national crisis, so says Biden, btw, the inexperienced one. America's already fighting two wars.
o I am not a president that needs to be tested, I have been tested.
o I'll protect the value of your home by buying up those bad mortgages. We have to protect the American dream of owning a home.
o I'm going to make gov't live on a budget just like you do.
o What America needs now is a figher, puts the cards on the table, does what's best for the American people. I've fought for you most of my life, there are other ways to love this country, but I've never done so from the sidelines.

Speech Highlights:
[Palin Highlights]
One of the most unique welcome's I've had to this state was looking down from the plane and seeing my face plowed into a cornfield. Piper got a kick out of that. You are so kind, so unique, so loving.
If you served in the military in the past stand and let us honor you. We owe you.
It's going to be a hard fought contest in Ohio, it's going to come down to the wire.
Are you ready to make JM the next POTUS, to shake up D.C.?
You have a clear choice in 13 days, on taxes, Obama's not being real clear. It's not mean spirited to call someone out on their record or their associations. It is in fairness to you the voters so you know what the choices are.
He's hiding his agenda of redistributing your hardearned money. The gov't takes your money and gives it away according to a politicians priorities.

We're for a real tax cut when the gov't takes less of your $$ in the first place.
Ohio, you know how to raise them right, we got to hand it to Joe the Plumber down in Toledo. He got Obama to finally state his true economic plan. A lot of folks identify with Joe. Tito the Builder was upset for the attacks against JTP for mearly asking a ?.
If you believe America is the land of possibilities, if you don't want your money redistributed, then I guess you're JTP too.
I guess you won't be supporting Barack the wealth spreader this election.
That's because his plan discourages hard work and will stifle this economy.
We have a plan to lower your taxes. We'll cut the capital gains tax, business tax. We'll keep USA business in the USA, keep more $$$ in the USA.
We'll get the USA energy independent, we need to drill here and drill now. It's a matter of economic and national security.
You have the choice between a politician who puts his faith in gov't and one who puts his in you. Between one who won't disavow voter reg. fraud, and one who won't tolerate it.
nov 4 coming quickly, its the time for choosing. itll come down to what we believe in. mccain and i believe in what reagan believed in: the forward movement of frdm and not constant expansion of govt. we believe that its time to break the highest and hardest glass ceiling. we believe the best of USA not all gahtered in DC, but in kindness and goodness and courage of everyday, hardworking ppl. we so believe in the promise of this country in all of its opportunites. and we believe america is not the problem, america the solution. USA. we may not be a perfect nation but we learn from our mistakes. we're that beacon of hope for all that seek equality and frdm and opportunity. we're still that shining city on a hill reagan spoke of.

and i am so thankful we have a man ready and worthy to lead that nation. he inspires us w/ heroic and trustworthy deeds and not just words. so if you believe in what we believe in, and you're ready to shake up DC and clean up WS, and get economy back on track from now until election day, which is coming so soon, you'll hear our opponents go on and on about how they'll claim to fight for you". since my running mate usually wont say this on his own behalf, ill say it for him: there is only 1 candidate in this race who has ever really fought for you. he is the only man with courage to keep fighting for you. he is john mccain.

[Highlight's from McCain's Speech]
I can't wait to introduce her to D.C.

I study history, I'm not going to break that tradition, we're going to win Ohio

We've heard a lot of words, finally heard what Obama believes thanks to JTP, he wants to spread the wealth around

He takes your piece of pie instead of growing the pie

Will cut income taxes for 95 percent, when more than 40 pay none, how do you reduce the number zero? That's the key to his whole plan, the government will write them all checks and the treasury will tax other people, including lots of other people like you and joe and small businesses.

This week we learned that Obama's tax plan looks like welfare so he added an employment cause, 16 days before the election. He'll say anything to get elected. If you're unemployed you won't get anything at all.
He'll kill jobs when we need to be creating jobs.

McCain-Palin tax is the real thing. We'll keep American businesses in America.

What a crowd, what enthusiasm, is there any doubt we're going to win this election? America didn't become this greatest in the world by spreading the wealth.

We'll bring our troops home in honor and victory. Not in defeat.
If Obama is elected, we'll have a national crisis, so says Biden, btw, the inexperienced one. America's already fighting two wars.

I am not a president that needs to be tested, I have been tested.
We've seen the wrong response from Obama over and over. The surge, he'll sit down unconditionally with the world's worst dictators, when Russia invaded Georgia he said Georgia should show restraint.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We have to act, we need a new direction and we have to fight for it. I've been fighting for this country since I was 17 and I have the scars to prove it. I'll take America in a new direction from my first day to the last. I'm not afraid of the fight. Not going to spend 170 trillion to bail out Wall Street, I'll protect the value of your home by buying up those bad mortgages. We have to protect the American dream of owning a home.

Let retirees keep their money longer, raising taxes makes a bad economy much worst. The explosion of government spending, has weakened the dollar, made everything more expensive. If I'm elected President, when I'm elected president… I won't spend nearly a trillion dollars more of your money, Obama will. I'm going to make gov't live on a budget just like you do. I will freeze gov't spending on all but the most important programs. We'll get rid of the ones that aren't working for the people. I've veto every porkbarrel bill. I'll help those who lost a job that won't come back find a new one that won't go away.

Obama wants to raise taxes and restrict trade, like in the Great depression. Those who fail to learn from history are doomed to repeat it, I won't let that happen. We're going to stop sending money overseas to pay for oil, He'll consider offshore drilling, we're going to drill offshore and we're going to drill now. We'll invest in all alternative energy sources, nuclear, wind, clean coal.

What America needs now is a figher, puts the cards on the table, does what's best for the American people. I've fought for you most of my life, there are other ways to love this country, but I've never done so from the sidelines.

We're at a moment of nat'l crisis. Yes we will lead.

I'm an American. And I choose to fight. Don't give up hope. Be strong. Have courage. And fight.

Fight for a new direction for our country. Fight for what's right for America.

Fight to clean up the mess of corruption, infighting and selfishness in Washington.

Fight to get our economy out of the ditch and back in the lead.

Fight for the ideals and character of a free people.

Fight for our children's future.

Fight for justice and opportunity for all.

Stand up to defend our country from its enemies.

Stand up, stand up, stand up and fight. America is worth fighting for. Nothing is inevitable here. We never give up. We never quit. We never hide from history. We make history.

Now, let's go win this election and get this country moving again.

TY and god bless!

I agree with your unhappiness, but not your approach. I think you should talk with someone at UNDP and try to find out how much they have committed and if it is a grant or matching funds, what the scope of the project is, what the deliverables are, etc. Or you can wait and try to get those details from Darien.

The problem is that President Clinton apparently told Ira he supported this in concept. With Ira, if you give him an inch he will take a mile.

In reading the attached letter from the Barbados PM, I'm a bit inclined to recommend WJC writing back and delicately saying something like: this is an issue of shared importance and I'd like to be helpful but am not sure yet exactly what a project could or should look like (and how much it would cost and over what timeline, with what specific deliverables) and I therefore would welcome input from you (the PM) and other leaders in the region before this is discussed publicly, and I'd like you to speak with my staff (listing us and not Ira).

And/or we can call the UN Secretary General's folks and say their UNDP/energy folks should deal with us and not Ira.

The above seems like a nuclear option but at this point unless we do something, it seems like Ira is going to proceed on something that we don't really have a handle on, and it could be good, but on the other hand - and given precedence with CHAI and CCI - it could spend (a lot of) money without us knowing specifically what WJC and the world will get in terms of results (on a timeline) and/or us being able to control how WJC's name / legacy are being impacted / used in relation to this project.

Maybe I am being petty but just wanted to raise this option with you, and I'm happy to proceed as you wish. Tackling islands is something we all believe in but it's hard to know what Ira's plan is and hard to trust it since we seem to learn of things after the fact, as evidenced by us learning of this "launch" via the email below today. Thanks.

Attached is a letter that will come to President Clinton from the Prime Minister of Barbados inviting him to speak on May 8 at a high level conference of energy Ministers from all of the Island nations in the world. The conference is being sponsored by UNDP and we will be participating. I will be there.

UNDP is providing funds to the Clinton Foundation for our work on clean energy and we will be launching our work at this conference.

Obviously, if President Clinton can speak, that would be great. If he cannot attend but could provide a video, that would also be very helpful.

I am sorry for the short notice, but the conference has come together rather quickly.

I've long held an interest in politics, spent a decade living and working in DC after graduate study at GW, as I had mentioned, in public policy and public administration. I am a registered Independent voter, voted for Obama in the last two elections, and also have voted for Republicans in Gubernatorial races here in Massachusetts.

I am excited about the prospect of Hillary running for the presidency again, yet as a middle-aged (47) professional, I'm not yet convinced she is my candidate. For the first time in my voting history, I know that my vote cast will not be based on gender or social issues alone. Yet at the same time, when my 8 year old daughter turned to me last year to say it would be great to see Hillary the first woman president, I had to agree if for no other reason than seeing in her young eyes the hope and possibility that a statement like that could reveal.

In preparation for a campaign announcement and the months ahead, what I wanted to share with you are a few perspectives on things I believe the Hillary campaign strategy should address:

Congruence:

Hillary is a historical figure, a woman with phenomenal accomplishments, but presents in public with a lot of incongruity. For example, in terms of income inequality, how can Hillary project empathy and humility when the majority of her life, at least the last 25+ years of it, was spent in the 1%? Given campaign finance her relationships with Wall St is understood. Yet what does it mean to have these relationships and campaign for closing the income inequality gap? In what ways will Hillary's goals about addressing income inequality be innovative, realistic and actionable? In what ways can they include Wall St. banks?

How can Hillary's campaign platform focus on advancing women and children's issues when the Clinton Foundation receives donations from countries with blatant disregard for women's rights? In what ways can she explain this publicly and authentically without political spin?

Purple:

The ability to reach across party lines and strive for bipartisanship is a worthy ideal despite the polarizing environment that occupies Washington. Emphasizing how Hillary will work with the Republican congress going forward is as essential as showcasing ways she has done this in the past. What are her views on defense, immigration and healthcare that are not entirely in lock step with President Obama's, for example? How can that appeal to the Independent voter that does not vote party line?

Foreign Policy

Foreign policy is a top campaign issue for 2016. Many Americans have been disturbed about Obama's foreign policy missteps, and have not felt safer in an increasingly dangerous world rife with radical Islamic extremists. The general sentiment about President Obama's earlier statements on ISIS (J.V team, not having a strategy to combat it, not using the verbiage radical Islamists) left the American voting public uneasy about the ability of the Democratic party to execute a muscular approach to military and diplomatic affairs. While I thought the NYT article yesterday on the Obama Doctrine was excellent, many Americans remain skeptical about a successful Iranian deal that cuts off pathways to nuclear weapons with a country unlikely to loosen its grip on extreme religious ideology, the form that teaches hate and destruction to its youngest citizens and sponsors terrorism.

Hillary's depth of knowledge related to world affairs and foreign policy should include a strategy for communicating a forward thinking geopolitical vision in ways that present her unique strengths. This foreign policy strategy needs to convince the voting public why Hillary, why now, (in part, by compare to Obama) and to her Republican challengers who will do everything to associate her with past missteps and perceived party weaknesses.

Engagement

Thriving companies in the private sector are focused on increasing transparency, flattening hierarchies and encouraging employee engagement.

How can Hillary create a digital campaign to engage US citizens in a large-scale dialogue that's unique: social media, video, crowd-sourcing ideas, online events? Engaging the hearts and minds of the American voters in 2015-2016 should be an exercise in transparency, collaboration and one that goes beyond party platform, beyond label and beyond gender alone.

John, thank you for taking the time to read this (long!) note. If there's a chance for us to meet, either here in the Boston/New England region or in Washington DC, I'd be excited by the opportunity to discuss campaign strategy with you further, especially around ways that will appeal to voters beyond the base.

Sincerely,

Emily

Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 07/31/08

Main Topics: "Celeb" Ad, McCain's Double Standards, Bush on Iraq

Summary: Interest in McCain's "Celebrity" ad and Obama's "Low Road" response carried over from last night. Analysis of the exchange between the campaigns was the meat though discussion of the risk of backlash provided a welcome break. President Bush spoke briefly about SOFA negotiations and shorter tours for soldiers in Iraq. At the same time oil companies continued to release record profit figures.

Highlights:

1. "Celeb" coverage continues
   a. ABC: "Celeb" brings out the "angry, bitter, old man" in McCain
   b. MSNBC: Maddow: "Celeb" fallout is "the car crash between the McCain of 2000 and the McCain of 2008"
   c. MSNBC: McCain strategist Todd Harris defends Paris Hilton ad, yet admits it detracts from McCain brand
   d. CBS: Bob Schieffer predicts backlash from negative Paris Hilton ad
   e. FNC: Nicole Wallace on "Low Road": "If we wanted to join them on the low road, we'd have to ask them to pull over"
   f. MSNBC: Nicole Wallace denies Paris Hilton ad is "personal"
   g. MSNBC: Wallace defends "Celeb"
   h. CNN: Bash: "Celeb" may be off message, too negative
2. MSNBC: Maddow accuses McCain camp and media of racism, double standards for Obama
3. MSNBC: Barnicle discusses historical analogues, highlights debates as a potential turn-around
4. FNC: Bush talks about SOFA negotiations, announces shorter tours in Iraq

Highlights, No Clip:

1. FNC – HOWARD WOLFSON: "I think John McCain has failed to capitalize on the power of the internet in a way that is very damaging."
2. CNN – ROLAND MARTIN: "John McCain is acting like a jilted lover. He once said the press was his base. They are frankly upset that the press seems to be liking Obama."

Clips:

Highlight #1
"Celeb" Brings Out the "Angry, Bitter, Old Man" In McCain (ABC 07/31/08 7:05am)
CHRIS CUOMO: Some odd campaign news today, there's a round of new commercials, really have us scratching our head here.

DIANE SAWYER: What sort of committee meeting do you have where they say, "Let's use Brittney! Let's use Paris! Yes, that'll be a blow." Anyway, we're going to be asking this morning . . . is this savvy strategy by the McCain campaign? . . .

SAWYER: . . . that new brand of negative TV ads this morning that use Brittney Spears and Paris Hilton as a kind of political nuclear attack . . .

JAKE TAPPER: . . . the McCain campaign thinks they have an effective line of attack against Sen. Barack Obama. That he is an arrogant . . . celebrity. But does the new McCain line of attack bring out a negative caricature of McCain? That he's an angry, bitter, old man. The new McCain ad depicts Barack Obama as a celebrity, akin to Brittney Spears and Paris Hilton . . . framing Obama as a celebrity allows McCain an opportunity to accuse Obama of other flaws. Quote, "Like most worldwide celebrities . . . this status has fueled a certain arrogance." This new Republican Party website, "Obama Audacity Watch," catalogues alleged arrogance . . .

[. . .]

TAPPER: Some former McCain aides wonder if the McCain brand will be hurt by his new strategy of attack, attack, attack.

DAN SCHNUR: You want to draw contrasts between yourself and your opponent but you want voters to see that as valuable contrasting information rather than simply as name calling.

TAPPER: John Weaver, McCain's former political aide who left the campaign last summer, tells ABC news that the Brittney ad is, quote, "childish," the new negative strategy Weaver says, quote, "reduces McCain." "John is capable of inspiring Americans. It's not the John McCain brand at all. It's like asking Wilt Chamberlain to play point guard." And now Obama is casting McCain, who already has a reputation for having a temper, as negative and angry. With 97 days to go, the caricature crayons are out.

[. . .]

TAPPER: A third party liberal group is now attacking McCain online, saying that he is the out of touch celebrity, pointing out that he wore expensive Italian loafers to a meeting with the Dali Lama. So there you have it, Paris, Brittney, Ferragamo loafers, the great debates of 2008 . . .

SAWYER: As someone said, "While Rome burns." . . . is this going to work? Is the McCain camp smart?

GEORGE STEPHANOPOLOUS: Well, they are certainly confident about this . . . and they are not backing off at all, they're feeling good. And I think one of the things they're happy about is that we're sitting here right now talking about all this. They wanted to get attention, they are getting attention. I think the question is, will the focus on the tactics overwhelm the message that the McCain camp is trying to send. There is a tradition of this kind of ad, going all the way back to 1988 when Republicans said that . . . Dukakis wanted Iowans to grow Belgian endive . . .

SAWYER: What about the former campaign aide saying it's childish? Is there a risk that there's a backlash and it does make Sen. McCain seem angry?

STEPHANOPOLOUS: Yeah, angry, cranky, too negative, bit of a whiner, given the fact that most polls show that he is behind right now . . .

Maddow: "Celeb" Fallout is "the Car Crash between the McCain of 2000 and the McCain of 2008" (MSNBC 07/30/08 8:10pm)
RACHAEL MADDOW: I think that a national election that is a national referendum on Bush and McCain and the Republican Party of the last eight years is an election that Barack Obama wins in a landslide. An election that is asking Americans what they think of Barack Obama, which is what John McCain has actually turned this campaign into at this point, that's an election that Barack Obama might win . . . this might be exactly where John McCain wants the campaign to be.

KEITH OLBERMANN: Does that explain this quote of the year from yesterday? . . ."McCain not really be speaking for the McCain campaign." Are they really that lost in terms of the head to head and issue to issue? Are they really that devoted to, "Don't vote for Obama, he's 'fill-in-the-blank'"?

MADDOW: . . . that's not the only example of the McCain campaign saying that John McCain doesn't speak for the campaign. They did the same thing on affirmative action. They said don't listen to what John McCain says, just allow us to be a vague, not-Obama presence in the corner that you might vote for if we succeed in scaring you enough about Barack Obama . . . if John McCain doesn't speak for his campaign, what kind of president would he be? . . .

KEITH OLBERMANN: It would be like when the great football quarterback, the late Bill Walsh, retired from the San Francisco 49ers and left . . . a play list . . . that his successor . . . was supposed to call for the first three games of the next season. I don't know who would leave him the list. Maybe it would be Cheney. This John Weaver . . . to the Atlantic . . . "For McCain to win in such troubled times he needs to start telling the American people how to lead us. That McCain exists . . . there is legitimate mockery of a political campaign now and it isn't at Obama's . . . " Is that one guy . . . or is there any groundswell of opinion that McCain and his campaign are making fools of themselves . . .?

MADDOW: I think this is the car crash between the McCain of 2000 and the McCain of 2008 . . . not only between people who have worked with John McCain and want to be associated with the McCain of 2000, people who thought that that reputation from 2000 would have carried over . . . he said he was going to be the McCain of 2000, that it was going to be a substance driven campaign, that he wasn't going to be scurrilous and negative . . . what his campaign is doing now, is a series of four negative campaign ads . . . it does seem pitiful . . .

McCain Strategist Todd Harris Defends Paris Hilton Ad, Yet Admits It Detracts From McCain Brand (MSNBC 07/30/08 5:02pm)
MIKE BARNICLE: And I can see him in December of 2007, in January and February of 2008, the same John McCain. So I guess the question is being asked by a lot of people in the politics business, the media business, the cosmetics of politics, What's happened to McCain? Is this stuff going to work? Why is he going this way?

TODD HARRIS: Well, this is about one thing and one thing only, which is to steer the conversation surrounding this race onto the issue of whether or not Barack Obama is qualified to be leader of the free world. That is issue terrain that the McCain people -- the McCain campaign feels very comfortable fighting this battle on. They feel that if this is what the campaign is about, a referendum on Obama's leadership, then that's their best shot.

And so yes. Is this -- you know, is the ad subtle? No. But you know, the media likes subtlety like it likes a kick in the head, and so this is going to catch a lot of eyeballs, get a lot of attention. And if this ad steers conversation toward that conversation of whether or not Obama is ready to be president, then it's going to be effective.

BARNICLE: Are you going to sit there and take that? I mean, you're a Democratic strategist. Come on.

STEVE MCMAHON: Well, I think my job tonight's actually a little easier than Todd's, don't you think, Todd?

MCMAHON: Listen, you know, the Obama campaign likes to say that Senator McCain's election would be like a third Bush term. But of course, before you get to a third Bush term, you have to have a third Bush campaign, and that's pretty much what they're running here. They're not running a campaign that Todd and John Weaver ran a long time ago.

John Weaver, of course, is the person who in 2000 ran the happy warriors campaign, when he was a happy guy. And Johnson Weaver today, in fact, said that his silence is over, that this campaign has diminished John McCain. He's not only not recognizing his old friend, John McCain, but he's, I think, furious at the campaign for doing this to his old friend.

The fact of the matter is John McCain can only win if he's a hopeful, optimistic leader and if he's offering a vision for America that people can embrace, not by tearing down Barack Obama, and certainly not by childish ads like this one.

HARRIS: Well, I think we have put all of this into some amount of context, though. It's like this whole campaign -- and on the Obama side has been all, like, kid gloves and lollipops.

MCMAHON: They've not run a negative ad. . .

HARRIS: No, no. But his supporters have -- they've run ads that have distorted McCain's record, and his supporters have called John McCain a warmonger. They've talked about distorting his position on Iraq. It's not like this has all been kid gloves. And yes, this is a hard-hitting ad, but it's been a hard-hitting campaign so far.

BARNICLE: We're going to show you the latest -- well, let's show you the newest McCain campaign ad right now and get your reaction to it. Here it is.

["Celeb" ad]

BARNICLE: You know, we sit here in living rooms and dens across America, and these ads come beamed across and you sort of half pay attention to them. I think a lot of people just half pay attention to them. But there's an element in that ad, right toward the end of the ad, where it has Obama's face up and the word "foreign" next to it, with "more foreign oil." There it is. It's right there on the screen now.

HARRIS: Well, it's true. I mean, you know, Obama -- he keeps saying no to -- no to expanded nuclear...

BARNICLE: Yes, but the "foreign"...

HARRIS: ... energy, no...

BARNICLE: ... the "foreign" deal. Obama's foreign deal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[CROSSTALK]

BARNICLE: No, I know, but you know -- you know...

HARRIS: Actually, he should say yes to foreign oil because that's his energy policy.

BARNICLE: Am I overreacting to that?

MCMAHON: Well, I don't think these things are coincidental. I do think, though, that Senator McCain has a choice to make here, and he's got to decide whether or not he wants to be happy warrior or he's got to decide whether or not he wants to be -- run for grouch-in-chief. And the danger when you're 72 years old, when you're running a campaign that just seems like a grouchy old man campaign, is that that's not what people want in a president. And it's not somebody who's offering a vision for the future.

If you look at the two campaigns, Senator Obama is offering a hopeful, optimistic, aspirational vision for America's future, and John McCain is running as Walter Matthau in "Grumpy Old Men."

BARNICLE: See, you stuck the age thing in three times there, the age, 72, the "Grumpy Old Men," the Walter Matthau thing...

[CROSSTALK]

BARNICLE: But earlier, Steve, you had said that...

HARRIS: [INAUDIBLE] the age stuff.

BARNICLE: Yes. You had felt that part of the McCain campaign had diminished the candidate. Do you think any part of this campaign has diminished John McCain?

HARRIS: Well, look, it's been a tough campaign, and it's going to continue to be a tough campaign. But you've got Barack Obama, who is treated, let's face it, line a celebrity amongst the media, who is getting -- is getting kid glove treatment. I don't think he's being put under the kind of media microscope that he needs to be.

And so, you know, if the press is not going to do it, then it's going to be incumbent upon the McCain campaign to call into question whether or not Barack Obama is prepared to lead this nation and to be commander-in- chief. That's the threshold question of this question. If ads like this get people talking about that, then it's probably going to be effective.

MCMAHON: You know, it's interesting. The footage from this ad, this footage is from his European trip. And Senator McCain's campaign actually taunted Barack Obama into going to Europe, going to Iraq, going to Afghanistan...

[. . .]

MCMAHON: So the Obama campaign goes, and they get crowds unlike the crowds that John McCain saw in Colombia and Mexico and Canada, when he was campaigning out of the country. And now they're upset by it.

HARRIS: Well, no one ever taunted McCain into...

MCMAHON: Now they're shocked that people in Europe might actually...

HARRIS: ... giving a speech...

[. . .]

BARNICLE: Let's stick with McCain, though, because you're right, he does get, you know, shortstopped in the media. He doesn't get as much attention, as much positive attention as Obama has. And yet I go back to my own eyesight, my own experience, and the fact that so many people, independents, really liked this guy, you know, when he came on stage at these town hall meetings with a smile and the microphone in his hand. And he was not your average Republican. There was an independent streak that he articulated. Where has this guy gone?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HARRIS: Well, McCain -- I will concede, certainly, McCain is not at his best when he's delivering overly partisan messages because McCain is at his best when he's not being partisan. That's why his approval rating among independent voters has always been so high. That's why so many crossover Democrats have always supported John McCain.

So to the degree that he can -- he needs to deliver this message talking about Obama. I think it's critical that the campaign frame this race as a referendum on whether Obama is prepared to be president. But it is a tough situation they're in because they need to do it in a way that doesn't make John McCain overly partisan.

MCMAHON: Here's the challenge the McCain campaign has, in addition to the -- to the grouchiness that they're displaying today. John McCain was the guy that you just described. He was the...

BARNICLE: How old is he, Steve?

MCMAHON: I don't know. I don't think...

[LAUGHTER]

MCMAHON: By the way, I don't think it's a function of his age. I think it's a function of the way he's behaving.

[. . .]

MCMAHON: It tends to remind people of his age. But that's -- but the point here, I think, is he used to be that guy you described. He used to be the maverick. He was the person -- he was the Democrats` favorite Republican. But to get the nomination, he decided he had to become George Bush. He flip-flopped on tax cuts. He adopted Bush economic policies. He walked away from his own immigration reform bill. He flip-flopped on offshore oil drilling. He's become a doctrinaire Bush Republican, and he's offering a Bush third term, and that's not what people want.

BARNICLE: Well, you know the ad we just showed you. Here's what Barack Obama said about that John McCain ad. Give a listen to this.

BARACK OBAMA: You know, I don't pay attention to John McCain's ads, although do I notice that he doesn't seem to have anything very positive to say about himself, does he. He seems to only be talking about me. You need to ask John McCain what he's for, not just what he's against.

BARNICLE: And he went to say that he's trying to -- Obama said, you know, He's trying to portray me as being a risky choice for a candidate.

HARRIS: Well, he is a risky choice . . . And if you compare the Obama record to McCain's record...

MCMAHON: Wow.

HARRIS: ... to McCain's record of change, you know, there's no question. Only one of these guys has actually been a change agent in Washington, and that's been McCain.

Bob Schieffer Predicts Backlash From Negative Paris Hilton Ad (CBS 7/31/08 7:05am)
BOB SCHIEFFER: Well it's certainly a sign they've changed strategy. They brought aboad a new strategist, Steve Schmidt, about a month ago from the old Bush campaign team. And he's bringing in some of the techniques the old Bush team used against John Kerry. They have concluded that while Barack Obama is famous that a lot of people really don't know him. So what they're trying to do is define him and tell people who is in their version. Now the question is, is this going to work? They're trying to picture him as an elitist, as someone who is aloof, sort of divorced from regular life. They're aiming this at those white, blue collar democrats who voted for Hillary Clinton and didn't vote for Barack Obama in the primaries. They're saying this is really not your kind of guy. The question though Maggie is will people believe this? This is kind of a stretch. To say Barack Obama has something in common with Paris Hilton and you have to wonder if people are going to buy that. I'll tell you the other part of it is, it's very surprising, it's very unlike John McCain and the kind of campaign he said he was going to run. So, maybe they will be able to define on their terms, but I think there's a high possibility that all this could blow up in their face and backfire.

Nicole Wallace on "Low Road": "If We Wanted to Join them on the Low Road, We'd Have to Ask them to Pull Over" (FNC 07/31/08 8:27am)
STEVE DOOCY: An new ad from the McCain camp paints Obama as a celebrity . . . take a look:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

["Celeb" ad plays]

[. . .]

MARTHA MACALLUM: I'm looking at what Barack Obama had to say yesterday in Reaction to this ad . . . something like, I don't know why he's always talking about me, you know if you have problems in your own life you point the finger at everyone else . . . what do you think about that?

NICOLE WALLACE: I think what's most surprising is, is that all the fuss being made about the celebrities and no attempt being made by the Obama campaign to defend against what is really the most serious questions raised in this ad. Which is his opposition to offshore drilling . . .

DOOCY: When you look at the Barack Obama phenomenon . . . when you ask them, what kind of experience does he have . . . they say, well I don't know . . . when you do point out the differences . . . that's fair but why did you add the celebrity at the top . . .?

WALLACE: Well, present company excluded, we have our challenges in focusing attention our vision for the future. Some of the challenges are . . . you must acknowledge reality and the reality is Sen. Obama is a celebrity we haven't seen the likes of in the political arena, certainly in my lifetime . . . in this election you can't just inspire people with your words and your crowds or your images or your photos but you must inspire them with your deeds and your vision. So that's the gap that we see opening up.

MACALLUM: Let's take a look at the Obama response ad . . .

["Low Road" ad plays]

MACALLUM: What's your reaction to that Nicole?

WALLACE: Well, look, if we wanted to join them on the low road, we'd have to ask them to pull over. [laughter] They launched the first attack ad against us . . .

Nicole Wallace Denies Paris Hilton Ad Is 'Personal' (MSNBC 07/31/08 7:15am)
MATT LAUER: This ad is much more personal and it is demeaning, isn't it?

NICHOLE WALLACE: Well this ad in some ways is a celebration of his celebrity. I mean I don't think there is much to debate this morning about whether he is or is not a celebrity The ad though if you watch the whole thing because if you show it in its entirety it makes a very serious point and sober point. There are two big roadblocks on our way to economic recovery and they include our dependence on Mideast oil and a move by the Obama campaign to raise taxes on almost every American.

LAUER: If that's the importance of the ad why bury the lead? Why is it the first thing we see are these images of Paris Hilton and Britney Spears? .. I have nothing against either one of them but they're not known for their gravitas and in some ways they can become the punch line of jokes. That's demeaning.

WALLACE: Well we've never made jokes about Paris Hilton in this campaign and look I don't think we're making a joke of Senator Obama and neither were the 200,000 Germans who were there to celebrate his celebrity. So again we are going to focus in the next 90 odd days talking about the issues I think we are very much in line with what the American people expect from their next President. But no one can forget or over look or obsure the fact that Barack Obama is the celebrity in this contest. And Senator John McCain, an American hero, is the underdog.

LAUER: Ok Robert let me bring you in here. So this issue of celebrity. What they're saying is there is all this raw excitement. There's this screaming and cheering, hundreds of thousands of people turning out at events and maybe they're trying to touch on this. Is there a possibility on your part that celebrity starts to overwhelm the message or become the message itself?

ROBERT GIBBS: I think what you see is people are excited abou change.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WALLCE: Well Matt I wish you'd come to our events because you'd see people yelling and screaming. Yesterday we were talking to employees of the Wagner Company in Denver Colorado and they certainly had a lot to cheer about Senator John McCain talking about his getting America working again. And for keeping us safe. So I wish you'd come out with us and see our fans. They might not be 200,000 strong and they certainly not European, but they are cheering and they are enthusiastic about McCain's leadershp.

Nicole Wallace Defends Paris Hilton Ad (MSNBC 07/31/08 7:25am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: Do you think its fair to wrap Obama in celebrity skin? What does he have in common with Paris Hilton or Britney Spears?

NICHOLE WALLACE: Well look I think this ad celebrates his celebrity, celebrates the excitement that's being generated, it is certainly more akin to the excitement a celebrity generates than a normal politician. We're running the campaign of an underdog. It's a position we're comfortable with. But if you run the entire ad, which I hope you will do, it makes a far more serious point – and that's to the big two hurdles to our economic resurgence which is as you talk about quite often. The number one issue in this election Barack Obama stands in the way by opposing drilling, efforts to reduce our dependence on Mid-east oil and by advocating higher taxes. The ad makes a serious point and acknowledges the reality of this election.

SCARBOROUGH: Well Nichole you call it a celebration of his celebrity at the same time the McCain campaign put out a statement yesterday that he's fussy just like celebrities and suggesting also that he's shallow just like celebrities. I don't know if you all were really intending that as a compliment.

WALLACE: Well I don't know any celebrities. I don't know. Maybe my counterpart has met some in the course of his campaign, but we don't have many traveling with us. I haven't had a chance to meet many celebrities but I think it's an overreaction to anything does certainly across as fussy. If you want to be President of the United States of America at this point in our history, you have to be able to, I think, see through things and make your points. We certainly have and we have a lot to overcome in this election cycle. But if you came out here with us, you would see we have supportive crowds who really ask us about the issues. They ask us about the economy, they wanna talk about our plans for keeping the country safe, and that's the campaign we're running.

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: Robert, is he a fussy celebrity? Describe your candidate.

ROBERT GIBBS: You know the last time I saw Britney Spears on stage with a politician, the guy looked a lot like John McCain because that's who it was. It was John McCain. Barack Obama is down to earth. He's spent this entire campaign talking about the issues that are important to people. The McCain campaign has decided apparently that the best way and the only way to win this campaign is to become very personal and very negative. That's why basically the last four commercials that they've released have been attacked as being false and baseless, the low road in politics, no evidence for the attacks or the evidence that they use in these ads. Look, we're going to let them take the low road, it's a place they feel very comfortable in. We'll let them do that. We're going to talk about the issues facing this country – joblessness in this country and how to create good jobs.

WALLACE: Listen you talk about the low road, if we wanted to take the low road, we'd have to ask you to pull over. The first negative attack ad in this campaign came from you campaign. And I think that when you walk around talking about knife fights and challenging the Republican nominee to a duel, you are insulting the American voters who have serious problems. You talk about serious problems, we have serious plans to solve serious problems. And the American people want to be inspired, not just by words but by deeds. And I think that is where the real gap is showing up on your side. And I think look there's always time to change, we can stop it right here and right now and we can agree between the two of us that we'll go back to our headquarters and get everyone on the phone and start these town hall meetings next week.

SCARBOROUGH: Robert?

GIBBS: Well you know you cited the report by Rick Davis we did accept doing a limited number of these town hall meetings. We want to talk to John McCain but we want to talk to real voters. And we're excited to talk to them about the change that we see. They've watched 8 years of the same failed policies, and now they see John McCain has taken the same failed policies and that's what he wants to bring to this country.

SCARBOROUGH: You won't agree to the 10 townhall meetings, how many will you agree to?

SCARBOROUGH: So you are saying in fact you believe and the campaign believes that Barack Obama doesn't care whether America wins or war or not; he just wants to be President. That's your position this morning.

WALLACE: Our position is that he placed a higher premium on doing what needs to be done to win an election than having the judgment necessary to win a war.

GIBBS: Joe here's all you need to know about this answer. Charlie Crist is auditioning to be Vice President. When you are trying out for Vice President you will say or do anything.

Bash on "Celeb" Ad: May be Off Message, Too Negative (CNN 07/30/08 6:05pm)
WOLF BLITZER: Let's get to John McCain's new ad, it tries to use Barack Obama's star power against him . . . tell us about this new ad that some say could be a gamble for him.

DANA BASH. . . some Republicans I talked to say this is a bit of a risky strategy. The McCain campaign . . . is using campaign cash to highlight and even embrace Barack Obama's broad appeal while trying to turn it into a negative trade.

In fact, one of McCain's advisers, Steve Schmidt, put it this way . . . "Do the American people want to elect the world's biggest celebrity, or do they want to elect an American hero?" On the stump, rapid-fire attacks on Barack Obama's policies.

JOHN MCCAIN: He wants to raise your taxes to pay for bigger government. We've been doing that for years and it doesn't work.

BASH: Yet on the air...

"CELEB" NARRATOR: He's the biggest celebrity in the world.

BASH: John McCain is now comparing his rival to Britney Spears and Paris Hilton, mocking him as a vapid celebrity.

"CELEB" NARRATOR: But is he ready to lead?

BASH: With this new ad, McCain strategists are trying to channel their frustration with the attention Obama gets into a hit on his readiness and seriousness.

RICK DAVIS: It's much more something you would expect from someone releasing a new movie than running for President.

BASH: McCain advisers say they are convinced Obama comes across as arrogant and are trying to capitalize on that.

STEVE SCHMIDT: This is a close election. We've seen much presumption from the Obama campaign.

BASH: But a new CNN/Opinion Research poll shows McCain advisers may be wrong on that. Only 37 percent say they view Obama as arrogant, pretty close to what they say about John McCain.

BRITNEY SPEARS (singing): Oops! I did it again...

BASH: The Obama campaign responded to McCain's new ad by accusing him of "... a steady stream of false negative attacks... Some might say, 'Oops! He did it again.'"

This is the latest in a series of McCain attack ads against Obama and increasingly biting rhetoric by McCain against his rival and several Republican strategists I talked to today . . . say they are concerned about the negativity. One told me he worries the McCain camp is allowing it's, quote, "disdain" for Obama to overshadow some valid, substantive political arguments against him.

Maddow Accuses McCain Camp and Media Of Racism, Double Standards For Obama (MSNBC 07/30/08 6:41pm)

RACHEL MADDOW: The larger narrative I think here is that Barack Obama is sort of an empty suit and that Barack Obama doesn't deserve this. I think I heard Pat articulate some of this a the top of the show today as well. This idea that Obama doesn't really know his place. That Obama is being presumptuous, you saw that certainly with Dana Milbank's I think very over the top column today in the Washington Post. Honestly, I'm very troubled by this being sort of run by the way it is broadly in the media- all quarters of the media left right and center. Frankly it's John McCain whose been running weekly radio addresses as if he's President. He literally ran two ads in May that described him as President McCain. In terms of whose acting like he's already President, he gave speeches talking about what the world is going to be like at the end of his first term. And nobody said who does McCain think he is? But people are willing to say that about the young candidate, the black candidate and in a way I think it is not all validated by the facts of how these candidates are behaving, but by who they are. I think it really reflects a national prejudice, not the campaigns.

Barnicle Discusses Historical Analogues, Highlights Debates As Potential Turn-Around (MSNBC 07/30/08 5:52pm)
MIKE BARNICLE: Michael, what do you think? A pretty good retort there.

MICHAEL CROWLEY: It is. Once again, we see why Obama is a good politician. It's a funny riff. He seems comfortable. He is taking on a very charged subject head on and laughing at it. It is not a laughing matter. He's exactly right. I think that's why he has been somewhat under performing the generic Democrat in the polls. Ultimately, I don't think the attack mode suits John McCain well. We saw today one of his long time confidants and advisers, John Weaver, came out and said he doesn't like the tone of this campaign. I really do think it's dangerous for McCain to be as negative as he has been. Maybe Obama can afford to be kind of chuckling about this right now.

BARNICLE: Gene, let me ask you, off what Michael said, there's been a couple of new attack ads put out by the McCain day. Every campaign puts out attack ads. It's not just John McCain. We should point that out. But there's a feeling out there, when you talk to ordinary people, not us, that this stuff isn't going to sell this year, the patriotism thing, the flag lapel stuff. What do you think?

JEANNE CUMMINGS, POLITICO: Maybe it won't sell, but it would be the first time it didn't sell. I think that the Obama people are right to respond very aggressively to this sort of thing. I think the dynamic of this race feels very much like Carter/Reagan in reverse roles. Reagan was the risky one. He was this crazy actor, too conservative, going to hit the nuclear button; we can't trust him. That's the position of Barack Obama right now. As soon as Reagan went into one debate and showed he wasn't a crazy man, in fact, they can trust him, things changed. I think we could be looking at that dynamic.

BARNICLE: Yes, the debates are clearly going to be crucial, just the cosmetics of the debate.

MICHELLE BERNARD: The cosmetics of the debate. I just want to step back for a second, because I think what Barack Obama did today, I thought was fascinating. He was his own anti-Willie Horton ad. He's gone out on the offensive. He's kind of looking at what could be coming down the pike, in terms of 527s, things we've heard people say about Michelle Obama, people talking about his name being Hussein. He did it such a very charismatic way that it can only help him.

By the time we get to the debates, there's going to be a stark contrast, not just in age, but in appearance, in height, in the way that they speak. I think that a lot of members of the American public are going to find it very difficult to only focus on what they're hearing in terms of policy from the candidates, because the two of them look so differently and Barack Obama is a much better speaker than John McCain.

BARNICLE: Except that, back to your point, Michael, the point you just raised. We were talking earlier about the McCain of late `99 and 2000, the McCain of December 2007, and January and February of `08. It's the John McCain that a lot of people, I think, got used to, very attractive, sort of mellowed out, very independent, a lot of people attracted to his candidacy as a result of that. Do you think it's a bit too jarring for the people who do follow these things, average American voters who do follow these things, to see a different John McCain now?

CROWLEY: Yes, absolutely, Mike. I think, you know, when he won New Hampshire in 2000, that was on the strength of independents, who were taken with this guy who seemed to be practicing a new kind of politics. There's some relationship to Obama's new brand of politics. McCain was running a different kind of politics. He seemed to be more honorable and above the typical fray. That just seems to be out the window. I think you have to be really troubled when a guy like John Weaver, who is someone who is really close in his orbit, who helped to orchestrate that 2000 primary win New Hampshire, thinks that this isn't the happy warrior. This isn't the John McCain that was so successful in politics, that made his name nationally, that became such a potent force.

It just feels now like much more of a paint by numbers Republican campaign. At a time when the Republican brand, frankly, is in the toilet, I think he's better off going with the formula that worked for him in 2000 than just reprising the old RNC attack ad approach.

BARNICLE: We're going to take a break here in order to do some media bashing when we get back. We'll be back with the round table for more of the politics fix. You're watching HARDBALL, only on MSNBC.

Bush Talks about SOFA Negotiations, Announces Shorter Tours in Iraq (FNC 07/31/08 8:05am)

THE PRESIDENT: Good morning. This has been a month of encouraging news from Iraq. Violence is down to its lowest level since the spring of 2004, and we're now in our third consecutive month with reduced violence levels holding steady. General Petraeus and Ambassador Crocker caution that the progress is still reversible, but they report that there now appears to be a "degree of durability" to the gains we have made.

A significant reason for this sustained progress is the success of the surge. Another is the increasing capability of the Iraqi forces. Iraqi forces now have 192 combat battalions in the fight -- and more than 110 of these battalions are taking the lead in combat operations against terrorists and extremists.

We saw the capability of those forces earlier this year, when the Iraqi government launched successful military operations against Shia extremist groups in Basra, Amarah, and the Sadr City area of Baghdad. Because of these operations, extremists who once terrorized the citizens of these communities have been driven from their strongholds. As a result, our Ambassador to Iraq, Ryan Crocker, was able to walk the streets of Sadr City last Wednesday, as something that would not have been possible just a few months ago.

This week, the Iraqi government is launching a new offensive in parts of the Diyala province that contain some of al Qaeda's few remaining safe havens in the country. This operation is Iraqi-led; our forces are playing a supporting role. And in the moments -- in the months ahead, the Iraqis will continue taking the lead in more military operations across the country.

As security in Iraq has improved, the Iraqi government has made political progress as well. The Iraqi Council of Representatives has passed several major pieces of legislation this year, and Iraqi leaders are preparing for provincial elections. And Prime Minister Maliki recently returned from a successful visit to Europe, where he held important diplomatic discussions with Chancellor Merkel, Prime Minister Berlusconi, and His Holy Father Pope Benedict XVI.

The progress in Iraq has allowed us to continue our policy of "return on success." We now have brought home all five of the combat brigades and the three Marine units that were sent to Iraq as part of the surge. The last of these surge brigades returned home this month. And later this year, General Petraeus will present me his recommendations on future troop levels -- including further reductions in our combat forces as conditions permit.

As part of the "return on success" policy, we are also reducing the length of combat tours in Iraq. Beginning tomorrow, troops deploying to Iraq will serve 12-month tours instead of 15-month tours. This will ease the burden on our forces -- and it will make life easier for our wonderful military families.

We're also making progress in our discussion with Prime Minister Maliki's government on a strategic framework agreement. This agreement will serve as the foundation for America's presence in Iraq once the United Nations resolution authorizing the multinational forces there expires on December the 31st.

We remain a nation at war. Al Qaeda is on the run in Iraq -- but the terrorists remain dangerous, and they are determined to strike our country and our allies again. In this time of war, America is grateful to all the men and women who have stepped forward to defend us. They understand that we have no greater responsibility than to stop the terrorists before they launch another attack on our homeland. And every day they make great sacrifices to keep the American people safe here at home. We owe our thanks to all those who wear the uniform -- and their families who support them in their vital work. And the best way to honor them is to support their mission -- and bring them home with victory.

Thank you very much.

A Young Manager for Clinton Juggles Data and Old Baggage (The New York Times)
By Amy Chozick
March 15, 2015
The New York Times

On MSNBC last week, 70-year-old James Carville denounced the coverage of his old friend Hillary Rodham Clinton's use of a personal email account at the State Department, ticking off two decades' worth of scandals surrounding the Clintons that he attributed to an irresponsible news media.

Mr. Carville complained to the host, Andrea Mitchell, that he had ''lived through this.''

''Do you remember Whitewater?'' he asked. ''Do you remember Filegate? You remember Travelgate? You remember Pardongate? You remember Benghazi?''

Meanwhile, far from the television lights, Robby Mook, the 35-year-old who is likely to manage Mrs. Clinton's 2016 presidential campaign, kept his head down and worked the phones from his standing desk to build a field operation in Iowa, set up technology to collect data to target voters and hire a campaign staff in a handful of key states. Mr. Mook was 12 and auditioning for school plays in Vermont when Bill Clinton was first elected president. He was a popular high school freshman when Kenneth W. Starr investigated Whitewater.

The uproar over Mrs. Clinton's use of personal email as secretary of state, which shielded her correspondence from public records requests, has presented the first media firestorm in her pursuit of the White House. But it has also revealed the stark generational divide that confronts her budding 2016 campaign.

Over more than two decades in national politics, the Clintons have amassed an army of well-meaning defenders who will bring to 2016 old battle wounds and axes to grind that date back to the White House and Arkansas -- perhaps not the ideal message in a presumptive campaign that seeks to reintroduce the 67-year-old Mrs. Clinton as a fresh, forward-looking candidate.

It falls largely on Mr. Mook, and the band of young operatives he has assembled (called the Mook Mafia), to move the grievance-laden Clinton machine into the modern political age. The success of Mrs. Clinton's campaign will rest in part on whether this younger generation of earnest, data- and social-media-savvy operatives can prevail.

''They are going to be the first ones to hit the beach on D-Day,'' said Chris Lehane, a Democratic operative and former aide to Mr. Clinton. ''To get the campaign off the beach while under fire, the front-line troops will need to be in charge and empowered to run a modern-day, forward looking, smart campaign.''

The Clintons anointed Mr. Mook as much for his ease with data and technology as for his calm temperament. They value his rare ability to charm and include the abundant advice-givers without allowing them to become too intrusive. Still, asserting himself among so many influential veterans will not be easy.

Even as Mr. Mook was starting to build the infrastructure of the campaign, a crowded circle of advisers joined him in deliberating over how Mrs. Clinton should respond to the email controversy. They included John D. Podesta, her presumptive campaign chairman, who has known the Clintons since George McGovern's presidential campaign in 1972; the former Clinton administration officials Cheryl D. Mills and James E. Kennedy; Huma Abedin, a longtime aide to Mrs. Clinton; and Mandy Grunwald, who has advised the Clintons since 1992.

Ultimately, the strategy they settled on -- having Mrs. Clinton publicly address the controversy on Tuesday -- harked back to the approach used in 1994, when Mrs. Clinton, wearing a blush-colored sweater set, held a lengthy news conference to address the Whitewater inquiry and a 1970s commodities trade in Arkansas. Comparisons quickly erupted. ''Mrs. Clinton is stuck in the '90s,'' declared the conservative talk show host Rush Limbaugh.

The next day, the operation took its first coordinated step toward wrangling the Clintons' old friends and former aides, like Mr. Carville. Mrs. Clinton's 31-year-old press secretary, Nick Merrill, hosted a conference call with about 25 far-flung surrogates to make sure they delivered the same message about the emails.

Part of why Mr. Mook landed the job was that in 2013, as the campaign manager for Terry McAuliffe -- a close friend to Mr. Clinton who is now governor of Virginia -- he deftly nurtured the Clintons' vast network of friends with frequent phone calls, but did not get distracted by the noise and drama that often attaches itself to the couple.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

‘‘Eighty percent of it is people just want to be heard, and Robby was always available,’’ said Tina Flournoy, chief of staff to Mr. Clinton.

He particularly impressed Mr. Clinton, who may be the ultimate strategist of his wife’s 2016 campaign. The former president checked in often about specific districts or counties, but Mr. Mook did not change course based on his influence, said Mr. McAuliffe, who compared him to ‘‘a horse in the Kentucky Derby’’ with blinders on.

‘‘President Clinton loved him, and they had a great relationship,’’ Mr. McAuliffe said in an interview. ‘‘But Robby is happiest when he is in his office with his computers and his data.’’

It helped, of course, that Mr. Mook led that campaign to an unlikely victory after Mr. McAuliffe’s first attempt at the governor’s office flamed out in the 2009 Democratic primary.

Brennan Bilberry, the McAuliffe campaign’s communications director, described Mr. Mook’s approach as ‘‘test everything, question assumptions and let data drive things.’’

Mr. Mook was inducted into the extended Clinton family during the 2008 presidential primary, when he was Mrs. Clinton’s state campaign director in Indiana, Nevada and Ohio: three states that were rare bright spots for Mrs. Clinton in her bruising battle against Barack Obama.

But despite Mr. Mook’s efforts, the campaign did not keep pace with the Obama team’s use of social media, digital targeting and data analytics.

‘‘The Clinton field program was not at the same level of sophistication,’’ said Geoff Garin, who succeeded Mark Penn as Mrs. Clinton’s chief strategist in 2008 and was Mr. McAuliffe’s pollster. ‘‘By the time of the 2013 campaign, Robby was advancing the state of the art rather than trying to catch up with it.’’

That will take some getting used to for the Clintons, who came to power when cellphones seemed state of the art. In her last campaign, Mrs. Clinton tapped Patti Solis Doyle, an aide since 1992, as manager. Ms. Doyle was later ousted, and Maggie Williams, another former White House aide to Mrs. Clinton, took over.

‘‘Maintaining your relationships and doing it well takes work, and it’s a credit to them,’’ Ms. Flournoy said of the Clintons.

The unassuming son of a retired physics professor and hospital administrator, Mr. Mook, who did not respond to messages seeking comment for this article, wears a simple uniform of chinos and a polo shirt. He keeps an exhausted campaign staff energized late nights with his goofy sense of humor, including a killer impersonation of Mr. Clinton.

Mr. Mook joined the McAuliffe campaign directly from his job as executive director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (‘‘without even taking a day off,’’ Mr. Garin said). He irked some old Clinton operatives by bringing in a mostly new campaign staff to help with Mr. McAuliffe’s second attempt at the governor’s office.

And the group surrounding him has its detractors, who say Mr. Mook has recreated the cliquish atmosphere that prevented fresh voices from penetrating the Clinton orbit in the past.

In November, ABC News reported on leaked messages from an email list operated by Mr. Mook and another young Democratic aide. The sophomoric jokes they contained about Mr. Clinton were not particularly damaging but did raise some concerns about their discretion.

But other episodes suggest a maturity to Mr. Mook. In 2008, after the Obama campaign’s offices in Indiana were vandalized, he reached out to Mitch Stewart, Mr. Obama’s state director, to offer him and his staff the use of the Clinton campaign space. The gesture, and others like it, endeared Mr. Mook not just to the Clintons but also to Obama aides, many of whom have signed on to senior positions under Mrs. Clinton.

Mr. Mook’s experience working for the Clintons leaves him well-positioned to bridge the campaign’s generational gap. ‘‘He’s old from the perspective that he worked for the Clintons in 2008, and new enough that he wasn’t really part of the inner circle of running the campaign,’’ said Thomas R. Nides, a friend and adviser who worked for Mrs. Clinton at the State Department.

No one could have predicted that the first big test of his abilities would come so early, with the email controversy, but people close to Mr. Mook say he has blocked out the crisis and is focused on the expected start of the campaign in April.

‘‘He will be, I think, in a Hillary campaign what he was in the McAuliffe campaign,’’ said Ellen Qualls, a Democratic strategist based in Alexandria, Va. ‘‘King of avoiding distractions and shiny objects.’’

As governor, Bush talked about troops in private e-mail (The Washington Post)
By Ed O'Keefe
March 15, 2015
The Washington Post

Jeb Bush used his private e-mail account as Florida governor to discuss security and military issues such as troop deployments to the Middle East and the protection of nuclear plants, according to a review of publicly released records.

The e-mails include two series of exchanges involving details of Florida National Guard troop deployments after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the review by The Washington Post found.

Aides to Bush said Saturday that none of the e-mails contained sensitive or classified information, and that many of the events mentioned in them were documented in press accounts, either contemporaneously or later. But security experts say private e-mail systems such as the one used by Bush are more vulnerable to hackers, and that details such as troop movements could be exploited by enemies.

Bush is actively considering a run for president and has sharply criticized likely Democratic front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton for her use of a private e-mail account when she served as secretary of state. He called it "baffling" that Clinton didn't consider the potential security risks of discussing diplomatic and national security issues by using an e-mail account not tied to a government server. An unknown number of the e-mails housed on Bush's server were redacted or withheld from public release because they contained sensitive security issues, Bush representatives have said. Communications director Tim Miller said general policy was for Bush to discuss sensitive National Guard issues in person with only occasional briefings by e-mail that "wouldn't contain information that should not be in the public domain."

"This Democrat opposition research dump of a few innocuous e-mails that Gov. Bush voluntarily posted on a Web site only highlights how large the gap is between him and Clinton in the area of transparency," Miller said in a statement.

As governor, Bush used his account, jeb@jeb.org, to conduct official, political and personal business, including plans to woo new businesses to the state, judicial appointments and military matters, the e-mail records show. His e-mail server was housed at the governor's office in Tallahassee during his two terms; he took it with him when he left office in 2007.

He later turned over about 280,000 e-mails for state archives under the requirements of Florida records laws, or about half of the total e-mails on the server.

In one e-mail sent four days after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the top general for the Florida Air National Guard told Bush that "we are actively planning sequences in preparation for mobilization orders should they come."

"They have not come at this time," wrote Ronald O. Harrison, who was adjutant general of Florida. "We are pretty good at anticipating the type of forces potentially needed and are prepared to respond to the Presidents call."

"Keep me informed of the mobilization," Bush wrote in reply.

Bush officials noted that many of the deployment orders issued after 9/11 were included in news reports at the time, including some of those mentioned in the Bush e-mails.

In November 2001, Bush and an aide to then-Lt. Gov. Frank Brogan exchanged messages about the deployment of National Guard troops to a nuclear power plant in Crystal River, Fla. The aide wrote Bush that a state lawmaker had called to say she thought "it is imperative that the Crystal River nuclear facility have National Guard security."

Bush wrote back: "Florida power does not want it. We are reducing or getting rid of guard protection in the other plants."

Aides to Bush argue that the nuclear plant discussions were innocuous and mostly public anyway. After the 9/11 attacks, the International Atomic Energy Agency had warned that terrorists might try to attack nuclear power plants.

Bush dispatched Guard troops to protect two South Florida nuclear power plants but not the Crystal River facility. The plant's operator, Florida Power Corp., declined the governor's offer of security, according to local news reports at the time.

Aides also say Bush's server was secure because it was kept at the governor's office.

But Johannes Ullrich, a cybersecurity expert who is dean of research at the SANS Technology Institute, said private accounts in general are more susceptible to attacks than government e-mail addresses, particularly attacks in which a hacker establishes a look-alike account that allows them to impersonate as the account holder.

Encryption technology was also far less sophisticated in 2001, he said, which could have made Bush's e-mails particularly insecure while traveling. If hackers gained access to Bush's account, he said, there's a chance they could break into the account of the National Guard commander or other officials with whom Bush exchanged e-mails.

"The bigger issue here is, what else can an attacker do?" Ullrich said. "Now I may be able to penetrate a National Guard commander's laptop by infecting it or by impersonating Jeb Bush's account. . . . Now you may even be able to give the order to remove troops or change deployments."

In recent days, Democrats - reeling from the criticism of Clinton's e-mail practices - have stepped up their critique of Bush on the same topic, arguing that he used his personal e-mail to avoid public scrutiny of his actions as governor.

"The GOP presidential hopeful's attacks on this issue are completely disingenuous, and there are still a litany of questions Republicans need to answer, like what e-mails has Jeb Bush not turned over?" said Holly Shulman, a spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee.

Bush rebuffed such criticism during an event in New Hampshire on Friday. "I'm not surprised that the Clinton operatives would suggest this. It's kind of standard operating procedure," he told reporters, referring to Democratic charges that his e-mail situation was no different than Clinton's.

He added later that he was "totally transparent. I have a BlackBerry as part of my official portrait, for crying out loud. There was nothing to hide."

Under Florida law, Bush was required to hand over e-mails related to his time in office. Bush aides say there were about 550,000 e-mails on Bush's server when he left office in 2007, although a portion of those came from before he began his tenure. About half that number were eventually turned over to state archives.

As noted Saturday by the New York Times, the archive process continued until last May, when attorneys for Bush delivered 25,000 additional messages. Aides have defended the pace of Bush's compliance, saying that it took seven years because of his volume of correspondence.

In February, Bush launched a Web site, JebBushEmails.com, telling visitors that "they're all here so you can read them and make up your own mind."

Bush's aides have strongly defended the process used to release his messages, noting that other potential GOP presidential candidates haven't released any e-mails or are having e-mails released only as part of ongoing government investigations. The list includes former Texas governor Rick Perry; Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal; Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker; and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie.

Perry and Jindal have used private e-mail for government business, according to the Associated Press. Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley (D) - who is also weighing a presidential bid - said last week that he used a private Gmail account as governor to communicate with aides and Cabinet officials.

When Bush published his e-mails in February, aides said many messages would be withheld or redacted to comply with state law barring the release of messages including Social Security numbers, confidential business issues or law enforcement and other security matters. Some of thepublished e-mails initially included Social Security numbers, forcing Bush's team to quickly redact them - an early stumble for the governor's fledgling presidential efforts.

A spokeswoman for the Florida secretary of state's office did not return a request for comment Saturday to explain why some e-mails were released and others withheld, saying any answer would require a fuller legal interpretation that wouldn't be available until next week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush's archives include a handful of other messages from leaders of Florida's National Guard. There are copies of the "Florida National Guard Activity Report" from August 2000 and December 2000, with information about troop deployments to the Caribbean, South Korea and Kuwait; the activation of units; and details on training exercises and drug seizures.

In October 2000, Harrison e-mailed Bush to remind him that 170 Florida Air National Guardsmen from Jacksonville would be deploying to Saudi Arabia to enforce the southern Iraq no-fly zone. The message said they would "coincidentally travel over with a group of 90 from the Texas Air National Guard" - a unit that was under the command of Bush's brother, George W. Bush, who was then Texas governor.

The next month, a lieutenant commander with one of the deployed units e-mailed Jeb Bush to thank him for sending a message of support, noting that "our unit has played a key role in missions directly related" to ongoing tensions between Iraq and Israel.. The officer added that "you can assure your brother the F-15s from your state could take the F-16s from his state!"

Immediately after news broke March 2 about Clinton's use of a private server, Bush faulted her for not releasing her e-mails from her time as secretary of state, writing on Twitter that "Transparency matters." He later raised concerns about Clinton's decision during an interview with Radio Iowa.

"For security purposes, you need to be behind a firewall that recognizes the world for what it is, and it's a dangerous world, and security would mean that you couldn't have a private server," he said. "It's a little baffling, to be honest with you, that didn't come up in Secretary Clinton's thought process."

On Friday night, after a meeting with potential supporters, Bush was asked to respond to criticism that he, like Clinton, was allowed to self-select which e-mails should be turned over for archiving.

"I was way too busy to decide," Bush said, before clarifying that his general counsel was among those involved in selecting which e-mails to turn over.

"It was a process that was based on the law itself, and we complied with the law and all during this time we've complied with the law, even in my post-governorship," he said.

President Obama jokes about Clinton's emails, Scott Walker and marijuana at Gridiron Club dinner (Washington Post)
By Ben Terris; Roxanne Roberts
March 15, 2015
Washington Post

Nine years after he made his Gridiron Club dinner debut as a fresh-faced young senator, President Obama took the podium again Saturday night, sounding wistful about the passage of time.

"Just a few years ago I could never imagine being in my 50s," he mused. "And when it comes to my approval ratings, I still can't."

No, seriously, folks. Remember, he told the white-tie crowd of elite journalists, when he was considered the tech-savvy hipster in the executive mansion? But now, "Hillary has a server in her house!" he exclaimed. "I didn't even know you could have one of those. I am so far behind."

Only in Washington does this scene not necessarily strike people as strange: Hundreds of reporters hobnobbing with the government officials they normally cover in an evening of fine dining and parody songs that make Weird Al Yankovic seem hip. Oh, and even though it's an event thrown by a group of journalists, guests are told not to spoil the fun by publishing anything.

But that's the Gridiron Club's annual dinner, a tradition of goofy skits, silly songs and music by the United States Marine Band that has remained virtually unchanged since 1885.The night, at its core, is unabashedly sentimental — the main objective is to promote "good fellowship."

The president — speaking at the dinner for a third time as president, fourth time overall — told the room that Democrats had determined they needed to do better with older white voters.

"Which is why I'm here," he said. He noted that if the crowd laughed at his jokes more than the last time he was around in 2013 there might be a reason for it.

"I'm not saying I'm any funnier," he said. "I'm saying weed is now legal in D.C."

[From 2013: President Obama at elite Gridiron Club jokes about sequester, Biden, Rubio]

The dinner is a love letter to a Washington that never really existed — a romanticized place where politicians, despite all the squabbling, share an abiding respect for each other, the press and the political process. If it was ever true, it's certainly not now — but it's must be nice to pretend for a few hours.

Why is this night different from all other nights? Because on this night, when Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker makes a joke about Hillary Clinton, it's not part of a future negative ad campaign.

"I really do have a lot of close friends who are Democrats," said Walker, serving as the official Republican speaker for the evening. " I even have Hillary's private email. . . It's HillaryClinton@Wallstreet.com . You know the best part of that joke, Elizabeth Warren wrote it for me."

Big laughs all around, even though soon enough half the room will be out to get him. And it didn't take long for someone to get retribution. But only jokingly of course.

"I'm sure Governor Walker has some really neat accomplishments," said Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe. "I mean, it's literally been years since his own constituents tried to recall him."

Obama got in on the Walker bashing a little too, but made sure to poke fun of himself in the process.

"[Walker] punted on the question of evolution, which I do think is a problem," Obama said. "I absolutely believe in the theory of evolution — when it comes to gay marriage."

With a guest list of 650 — a fraction the size of the much-hyped White House Correspondents' Association dinner — Gridiron is arguably a far more coveted ticket within Beltway circles. Gridiron is also the most insular of the city's press dinners. None of the speakers have to play to C-SPAN or CNN cameras, so they keep it for Washington, by Washington, with insider jokes designed for VIP political junkies who breathlessly parse every off-hand aside for hidden meaning.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And if that's not you? Well, at least. . . .

"This is great people watching," said Aneta Bazzie, a visitor here for an unrelated event — a conference of the National Association of Housing and Redevelopment Officials — as the crowd of famous-for-Washington types, dressed to the nines, paraded past her into the Washington Renaissance Hotel.

"Who's that?" her friend Susan Gillette asked, pointing at Andrea Mitchell in a sparkling ball gown.

"Who's that?" Bazzie asked about political scion/MSNBC personality Abby Huntsman. "You should write down she is wearing a nice dress."

"Who's that?" Gillette asked about Democratic ad maker Mark Putnam, and then about former Senator Ben Nelson, and then about Valerie Jarrett.

"Oh I know you!" Bazzie says running up to Sen. Shelley Moore Capito, and pointing to her sweatshirt bearing the name of their shared home state. "We're from West Virginia." All politics is local.

It was Obama's third appearance at Gridiron since becoming president; he originally seemed to avoid such Beltway traditions but seems to have raised his tolerance for them.

White House Press Secretary Josh Earnest broke away from a conversation with Politico reporter Mike Allen to head into the dinner. "It'll be all right," he predicted. "Everything's in better form when the president's here."

He was joined by an array of guests that included Cabinet members, congressmen, diplomats; baseball legend Hank Aaron;, TV news personalities Wolf Blitzer, Gayle King and Chris Matthews; and former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

"I'm just going to sit quietly and hope the president doesn't notice me," said possible Republican presidential candidate Ben Carson. He was on his way to change into his tux in the gym, when the hotel's general manager spotted him and gave him a free room for the evening.

Not at the dinner: Supposed 2016 frontrunners Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton. (Walker joked that the Gridiron Club "couldn't afford her.")

But oh, she was present in spirit. The controversy over Clinton's private email account is exactly the kind of personality-driven saga that Gridiron loves to mock in its ever-corny song skits. To the tune of Taylor Swift's "Shake It Off," naturally:

Oh the muckrackers'll rake, rake, rake, rake, rake

Harvard law professors' bleeding hearts will ache

Don't need you so I'll take, take, take, take, take

Take you out, take you out.

Or at least that's what we're told they did. One of the many peculiarities of the event is that the 65 members of Gridiron represent some of the most influential editors and political reporters in the nation's capital — and yet the dinner is closed to the press who would cover it. Which means this story, as always, is cobbled together from a viewing of the dress rehearsal, glimpses of the script, transcripts from helpful staffers and the damp cocktail-napkin scribblings of sympathetic guests.

The skits are a mixture of hokey and slick, the journalists dressed in elaborate costumes but often bolstered by strong-voiced ringers for the song parodies. There were male reporters playing Colombian prostitutes in a Secret Service skit. There were puns and bad jokes but nothing damning: The same reporters who appear on Sunday morning talk shows decrying the letter GOP senators sent to Iran had nothing to say about it on stage.

That fell to the president. "You don't diminish your office by taking a selfie," he said. "You do it by sending a poorly written letter to Iran. Really. That wasn't a joke."

The humor can be broad. There was a skit portraying the massive field of Republican presidential aspirants, all dressed in marathon garb: Rick Perry was portrayed as a dunce, Ben Carson insane, Rand Paul an overreaching know-it-all, Scott Walker a drop-out, Rick Santorum an egomaniac, Mike Huckabee an opportunist, and Jeb Bush as a guy saddled with an unfortunate moniker (sung to the Wizard of Oz's "If I Only Had a Brain"):

"No matter what a man inherits

You should judge him on the merits

Not his much too famous name

Just because he's presumin'

That he could be a new man

If he had another name."

And the Koch brothers were portrayed as ultimate king makers (to the classic Coke commercial tune):

"We'd like to buy the world for Koch

There's a billion we will spend

We pay to play in the USA

So freedom doesn't end."

The midterm shellacking of the Democrats was mocked with Johnny Cash's "I've Been Everywhere":

"We lost everywhere, man

We lost everywhere, man

Not just out Senate lair, man

We did not have a prayer, man

We're in need of some repair, man

We lost everywhere."

Are you beginning to get the picture? There were nods to Joe Biden, Elizabeth Warren, gay marriage, the Secret Service and McAuliffe, who was called "most ambitious man alive" in a song poking his quest for higher office (to Fleetwood Mac's "Don't Stop"):

"Don't stop thinking about McAuliffe

He'd stop at nothing to win

His whole life, American dream

National race his ultimate scheme."

But as any politician will tell you, it's better to be mocked than ignored. (Oddly, no mention of Marco Rubio, despite what looks like a serious campaign ramp-up. And Bobby Jindal? We hardly knew ye.) There was, as always, a toast to the president and the entire room linking arms and singing "Auld Lang Syne." A fantasy, like Cinderella's, that always ends by midnight.

President Obama jokes about Peril, promise of Clinton candidacy both on display lately (Associated Press)
By Nancy Benac
March 15, 2015
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — All the peril and promise of Hillary Rodham Clinton's expected presidential campaign played out in high relief this past week.

In one hour, really.

There she was, in her element, enjoying a hero's welcome at a U.N. conference on women. Cellphone cameras snapped away as she spoke with passion of women's rights as the "great unfinished business of the 21st century."

And there she was, a half-hour later, in her own personal hell just down the hall, carefully fending off questions from reporters asking about secrecy, ethics and whether she had played by the rules as secretary of state in using a private email account and server.

"I fully complied with every rule that I was governed by," she insisted without apology, in a deja vu moment that revived memories of all too many Clinton dramas past.

The back-to-back events showcased the past vs. future tug of war that could be a prominent dynamic of Clinton's campaign: the years of accumulated baggage versus the historic prospect of electing the first woman president.

For better or worse, Clinton has a long history with voters — two decades of triumph and travail related to her time as first lady, senator, failed presidential candidate and secretary of state.

In all its incarnations, the Bill-and-Hillary show has had more than its share of theatrics. While younger voters missed much of the show — Whitewater, travelgate, Monica Lewinsky and much more — the past looms large in Clinton's profile.

But Clinton's candidacy also dangles the making of history, the ultimate fulfillment of that "great unfinished business" for women of which she spoke at the U.N.

The mostly female audience at the conference was practically giddy to be in Clinton's presence and burst into applause when her introducer mentioned the presence of "a future president" in the room.

Clinton does not discourage such talk.

At a forum with Democratic women earlier in the month, she looked out over those in the crowd and asked if they hoped to see more women run for offices such as school board, governor, mayor, member of Congress.

"I suppose it's only fair to say," she added coyly, "don't you someday want to see a woman president?"

Clinton had hoped to spend much of March promoting her work on women's issues. But that theme largely has been overshadowed by the email controversy and questions about the propriety of the Clinton Foundation accepting foreign contributions when she was secretary of state and after she left the Obama administration.

At 67, it will be a challenge for her to give off the "new car smell" that President Barack Obama once famously said American voters want.

Republican pollster David Winston said the idea of a female president holds obvious appeal but can only be taken so far.

"It gives her an opportunity to be listened to that will be helpful to her," says Winston, "but she's got to do something with that opportunity."

Likewise, the idea of the first black president was a powerful part of Obama's winning 2008 campaign but had limited impact in the end.

In exit polls, just 9 percent of 2008 voters said race was an important factor in their choice for president.

Andy Kohut, founding director of the Pew Research Center, said the Clintons — and they are largely viewed as a package deal — offer both dynamism and the risk of “Clinton fatigue,” from all the years of charges and allegations.

“There are so many parts to the puzzle,” he said. “They’re complicated people.”

If the past few weeks have proved anything, it’s that it will be challenging for Hillary Clinton to steer the conversation around all that and in a forward-looking direction.

“The thing about having baggage is that it’s something you always have to manage,” Winston says. “What she’s got to do, and she obviously struggled with it this week, is how do you manage it in such a way that it allows you to say the things you want to say?”

Clinton is expected to announce her candidacy within the next month. Aides think she will be able to more nimbly respond to controversies once she has a full campaign apparatus in place.

At the U.N., before giving her response to the email controversy, Clinton took a moment to speak to reporters about gender equity and tell them that despite progress, “when it comes to the full participation of women and girls, we’re just not there yet.”

If it takes her own presidency to lead the way, she had to be thinking, all the better.

Hillary's meritocracy problem: The GOP will paint her as an elitist — and the right can make that charge stick (Salon)
By Bill Curry
March 15, 2015
Salon

Things were looking bleak for Walter Mondale on the 1984 day I dropped in on one of his top aides to critique his performance. The brilliant Paul Tully listened to this politically-minded nuclear freeze activist for as long as he could bear, then slammed his fist on his desk so hard the drawers rattled "Bill!" he screamed at me. "I can change everything but the candidate!"

Many Democrats this week are hoping Tully is wrong and that an experienced politician of deeply ingrained habits might change, either on her own or with some outside help. The debate over Hillary Clinton's email is also a debate about every concern Democrats harbor about their frontrunner. The way the questions have been posed — can she change? must she change — means they never go anywhere.

As framed by a facile media and D.C. political class, these questions are about as useful as the endless chatter before a Super Bowl about whether a quarterback or coach needs "to the win the big one" in order to "secure his legacy." So much of the talk is cosmetic. Some say that Hillary needs to adjust her personality: She must take criticism better, accept more responsibility, smile at the press. Others talk horserace, believing that a real campaign structure, the right consultant or an open-for-business Clinton war room will stem the attacks.

Few mention any need to change policy – for example, her faith on global capitalism, or her fondness for military intervention. And for all the talk of Hillaryworld dysfunction, no one challenges her campaign's basic model of mortgaging itself to the status quo to raise the billion dollars it costs to gather the demographics and pay the consultants to craft the empty ads it takes to win.

Hillary's most avid fans say she doesn't have to change a thing. Her spin is that all's well. The race hasn't started yet. Voters aren't paying attention; those who are don't care; those who care are Fox News voters she wouldn't win over anyway. This is a tempest in a Tea Party, a tiny flame lit by the far right and fanned by a Clinton-hating news media. She did nothing illegal or wrong. There was no real issue — and if there was one, the steps she took to address it were more than adequate. Case closed.

Polls support her on that. A Pew survey this week found just 17 percent of respondents followed the email story closely. Most were old—just 4 percent of the under-30 crowd said they were interested—and set in their ways. Forty-four percent of conservative Republicans were apparently glued to their screens. In other polls Hillary's support held steady.

But we take all polls too literally. It's hard to capture a softening of resolve or the emergence of doubt in a survey. The problem for Hillary is that her issues run deeper than this.

The week before the email story broke Hillary pocketed $300,000 for a Silicon Valley speech she gave to "women in technology." Her campaign—no matter what the pundits say, and however she may pay for it, she has one—spun it as a preview of her 2016 'message.' If so, she has a mountain of work to do. A month after the president struck a new and widely applauded populist chord in his State of the Union, Clinton managed to sound like the old consensus-seeking Obama. She actually vowed to restore bipartisanship in words so corny it hurt to hear them: "I'd like to bring people from right, left, red, blue, get them into a nice warm purple space where everybody is talking and where we're actually trying to solve problems."

She recited the usual Democratic economic litany but took care not to offend the odd technology billionaire who might be listening. Given the venue, one might expect as much, but weeks later she offered up the same riff, worse actually, at an Emily's List gala where she called for a "new participation age" and for America to "help more people start small businesses and invest in the…entrepreneurs that will create the new jobs of tomorrow." Also, Hillary said she'd cut "red tape."

The Emily's List audience was worshipful and Hillary tried her hardest to be more spontaneous and "real." That meant two lame pantsuit jokes, another about her hair and one about the color of that Internet dress. Talking about Sen. Barbara Mikulski she said, "We have to work out macro issues and also macaroni and cheese issues … for hardworking families they're one and the same." Listening to it all a second time, I felt bad for her.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Her worst performance was the 20-minute press conference she held at the U.N. to take a very few, selected questions about her emails. It was a strange venue for lots of reasons, not least among them that she has still to explain her 2009 order to U.S. diplomats to spy on other diplomats, including U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki-Moon. You'd think it the wrong place to plead the right to privacy. Her team bet it was the right place to cut short a media availability and they bet right.

The event has been criticized for everything from how long she waited to hold it to how quickly it unraveled and even its crazily discordant Guernica backdrop. Two of the criticisms matter. The first is that in delivering a masterpiece of syntactical elusion Clinton never conceded making a mistake of any kind. The second is that she seemed to think none of the issues raised had any validity.

She's wrong. The issues raised are not only valid but vital. Both our right to privacy and our right to know what our government does in our name are under assault. Politicians of both parties promise to safeguard and even expand these rights, but with each passing year our government knows more about us and we know less about it. At stake is our very autonomy as persons and as citizens.

The issue of transparency looms largest in matters of foreign and defense policy. The harm done our nation and the world under cloak of state secrecy is beyond measure. What we do in the open makes us proud; from the Marshall Plan and the Berlin airlift to the Alliance for Progress and the Peace Corps. It's what we do in secret that shames us, whether overthrowing and assassinating elected leaders in Guatemala, Congo and Iran to condoning mass bribery and spying on our own allies. The way to fix American foreign policy is to take it public. If we've learned anything in the last week it's that Hillary doesn't understand or believe that.

When Clinton does what no other cabinet officer dared do and then offers an excuse as flimsy and annoying as her convenience, she plays into an image that could be her undoing. It's not the shadowy, secretive Clinton narrative the media loves to push. It's the true story of the new American oligarchs who play by separate rules; who live privileged lives to which they feel entitled and who condescend to the less educated and prosperous whose expressions of democratic will they trust far less than their own expert knowledge.

Making charges of elitism stick is what Republicans do best. Think about it. Three times they were able to persuade voters that some poor Democratic sap—first Michael Dukakis, then Al Gore, then John Kerry–was more elitist than the Bushes. It didn't help that Dukakis was buttoned down, that Gore was stiff or that Kerry spent a lifetime cultivating the very accent the Bushes worked so hard to shed, but Republicans are good at this. Hillary reminds us of the flaws of her 2008 campaign but also of the ghosts of every losing Democratic presidential candidate of the last 30 years.

It isn't just the Republicans' flair for dividing us that makes this such a problem. America struggles under a failed meritocracy. Jefferson dreamed of a meritocracy — but not one that flocked to Wall Street or that took more than it gave. Nor did he dream of a country that rewarded its elites so richly that integrity and hard work would no longer ensure a decent life for everyone else.

Hillary knows how to give a populist-sounding speech. In 2008 she died two political deaths before her resurrection as an economic populist, of all things. She'd do well to recall that from then on she outpolled Obama by 400,000 votes. If she'd run that way from the start, she'd have likely won. This time she can't afford even one political death. If she falters in a primary, she's toast.

Clinton can't truly change her message or even her style without changing her policies and the very business model of her campaign. Can she do it? This much seems clear: In a political vacuum, she won't even try. If she's not challenged, she'll see no real reason for it. And if no real primary competition emerges, it will be up to progressives to apply the necessary pressure. We need to establish our own bottom line, to galvanize a strong movement to support it, and not back down.

All who would protect Clinton from such competition do her no favors — and the country a great disservice.

Hillary Clinton Spokesman: We Did Read Each Email (The Wall Street Journal)
By Laura Meckler
March 15, 2015
The Wall Street Journal

Hillary Clinton has taken a lot of hits over her decision to exclusively use a personal email account for her work as secretary of state. Among them: that in deciding which of the emails to turn over to the State Department, and which to withhold, nobody opened and read each email.

That was the conclusion that some reporters and experts drew from a nine-page fact sheet from Mrs. Clinton's office, which lays out the process she used in detail. Nowhere in that description does it say that the emails were individually reviewed. Rather, it describes a series of searches—using keywords and the names of public officials, for instance—used to figure out which emails were related to her work.

Now a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton says that in fact, each email was individually reviewed.

"Every email was reviewed," spokesman Nick Merrill said in an email. In an attempt to clear up any confusion, he added: "What was in the fact sheet were examples of techniques used by the reviewers to double and triple check they were capturing everything. This was NOT in lieu of reading them all, was in ADDITION to reading them all. We did not mean to imply otherwise."

There has, in fact, been confusion on this point, because the fact sheet made no mention of anyone reading the emails. Several publications wrote pieces saying that nobody in Mrs. Clinton's team read through all the emails. Some argued that it was easy to imagine emails relevant to Mrs. Clinton's official duties that could remain uncaptured by searching on names and keywords.

Federal law puts the responsibility on individuals to decide which of their documents are federal records that must be preserved. Mrs. Clinton's office said that in making decisions, she erred "on the side of including anything that might potentially be a federal record."
The Clinton fact sheet laid out the process in some detail. It said she began with 62,320 emails during the four years she was in office and said Mrs. Clinton asked her attorneys to sort through the account and figure out what needed to be turned over to the State Department after officials there requested the emails last year.

The fact sheet said that first, her attorneys pulled out those that had a government email address in any address field. That yielded 27,500 emails, which were designated official communications.

Then, searching among the other emails, Mrs. Clinton's lawyers looked for names of government and other officials, including close aides. They also sorted addresses by sender and recipient to look for email addresses that weren't obviously official.

Finally, they did a keyword search of the emails without government addresses, using terms such as "Benghazi" and "Libya," which presumably would have retrieved any emails about the attack on the diplomatic post there. Through those additional steps, the attorneys found 2,900 additional emails that were considered official.

It didn't mention an email-by-email review.

Some experts interviewed by the Wall Street Journal found the approach described in the fact sheet—which didn't mention reading every email—acceptable. Others found it lacking.

Jason R. Baron, former director of litigation at the National Archives, said the method described by the Clinton fact sheet wasn't robust enough to guarantee that official emails were retained, and her team should have reviewed all emails individually.

"You would have to do a line-by-line review to see if any sentence was related to government business," said Mr. Baron, who is now an attorney at Drinker Biddle & Reath. "If any portion of the document is related to government business, then it's a federal record."

By contrast, Jan Baran, an elections and ethics attorney who represents Republicans, said Mrs. Clinton's approach appeared to be reasonable, presuming her team included all emails produced by their searches.

"That is a reasonable standard approach to finding documents," he said. He said it isn't customary to read each email individually.

In the end, Mrs. Clinton gave the State Department copies of 30,490 emails last year, and she determined that 31,830 other emails were personal. She said she “chose not to keep” the personal messages, implying they were deleted.

A timeline of Hillary Clinton's e-mail saga (The Washington Post)
By Glenn Kessler
March 15, 2015
The Washington Post

"When I got to work as secretary of state, I opted for convenience to use my personal e-mail account, which was allowed by the State Department, because I thought it would be easier to carry just one device for my work and for my personal e-mails instead of two."

- Former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton, March 10, 2015

Given the interest in Clinton's e-mail arrangements as secretary, as a reader service, the Fact Checker has compiled an extensive timeline concerning government rules and regulations on the use of private e-mail accounts and her actions.

The timeline shows that before she became secretary, the State Department made clear that certain e-mail records should be retained and that official communication systems were preferred.

During Clinton's term as secretary, regulations were tightened concerning the preservation of e-mail records, and concerns were raised about the use of personal e-mail accounts for official business. But the legal requirement to immediately preserve e-mails from nongovernment e-mail accounts was not made mandatory until nearly two years after she stepped down.

1950: President Truman signs into law the Federal Records Act, which establishes the records-management responsibilities of government officials.

Oct. 30, 1995: The State Department Foreign Affairs manual is updated to reflect the emergence of something called "electronic mail." The manual notes: "All employees must be aware that some of the variety of the messages being exchanged on E-mail are important to the Department and must be preserved; such messages are considered Federal records under the law."

The manual then described how to determine which e-mails are such federal records, giving as examples: "Records that document the formulation and execution of basic policies and decisions and the taking of necessary actions; records that document important meetings; records that facilitate action by agency officials and their successors in office."

The manual also says that it is up to officials themselves to determine which e-mails should be considered federal records: "E-mail message creators and recipients must decide whether a particular message is appropriate for preservation."

Nov. 4, 2005: The State Department updates the Foreign Affairs manual to state that "sensitive but unclassified" information should not be transmitted through personal e-mail accounts. "It is the Department's general policy that normal day-to-day operations be conducted on an authorized AIS [Automated Information System], which has the proper level of security control to provide nonrepudiation, authentication and encryption, to ensure confidentiality, integrity, and availability of the resident information," the manual says.

Jan. 13, 2009: Clintonemail.com domain name is registered to a person named Justin Cooper, a senior adviser to former president Bill Clinton. (He then signs it over to a company called Perfect Privacy LLC, which offers private domain registration.) Hillary Clinton begins her confirmation hearings the same day.

Jan. 21, 2009: The Senate confirms Clinton as secretary of state.

Oct. 2, 2009: The U.S. Code of federal regulations on handling electronic records is updated: "Agencies that allow employees to send and receive official electronic mail messages using a system not operated by the agency must ensure that Federal records sent or received on such systems are preserved in the appropriate agency recordkeeping system." The responsibility for making and preserving the records is assigned to "the head of each federal agency."

June 29, 2011: A State Department cable to employees is issued under Clinton's signature (as are all cables) after Google revealed that hackers were targeting the personal e-mail accounts of U.S. government employees. The cable warns: "Avoid conducting official Department business from your personal e-mail accounts."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

August 2012: The State Department inspector general issues a scathing report on the performance of U.S. Ambassador to Kenya Scott Gration that includes criticism of the fact that he used a private e-mail account to handle “sensitive but unclassified” material. Gration is later fired.

“The Ambassador’s requirements for use of commercial e-mail in the office and his flouting of direct instructions to adhere to Department policy have placed the information management staff in a conundrum: balancing the desire to be responsive to their mission leader and the need to adhere to Department regulations and government information security standards,” the IG report said.

Feb. 1, 2013: Clinton steps down as secretary of state.

March 15, 2013: Clinton’s private e-mail account is first exposed after a hacker named “Guccifer” accessed the account of former Bill Clinton aide Sidney Blumenthal. The hack shows that Clinton communicated with Blumenthal using the private e-mail account of hdr22@clintonemail.com, and Guccifer published a screen grab of their exchanges showing that the two discussed a number of sensitive foreign policy issues.

The leak attracted little attention at the time, though an article in Gawker asked, “Why was Clinton apparently receiving e-mails at a non-governmental e-mail account?” John Cook, the author, added: “Neither the State Department nor the White House would immediately comment on whether the White House knew that Blumenthal was digitally whispering in Clinton’s ear, or if the e-mails were preserved as the law requires.”

Cook in 2015 said that Gawker filed a Freedom of Information request for copies of the e-mails, citing the specific e-mail address, but was told by State no records existed.

Sept. 9, 2013: The National Archives updates regulations on the handling of e-mails and federal records: “While agency employees should not generally use personal e-mail accounts to conduct official agency business, there may be times when agencies authorize the use of personal e-mail accounts, such as in emergency situations when Federal accounts are not accessible or when an employee is initially contacted through a personal account.”

Summer 2014: State Department officials responding to a request for documents from the House Select Committee on Benghazi realize there are no records to or from an official State Department e-mail account for Clinton.

Nov. 14, 2014: President Obama signs an update of the 1950 Presidential and Federal Records Act. The law expanded the definition of “federal records” to specifically include electronic communications. The law also clarified the responsibilities of federal government officials when they use nongovernment e-mail systems, which includes copying an official record or forwarding a complete copy of the e-mail within 20 days of transmission.

December 2014: In response to a request from the State Department, Clinton provides 50,000 pages of printed e-mails. The Department provides 900 pages related to Benghazi to the House committee in February.

March 4, 2015: Clinton tweets: “I want the public to see my email. I have asked State to release them. They said they will review them for release as soon as possible.”

March 10, 2015: Clinton tells reporters that she set up the system because she did not want to carry two devices - one for work e-mail and one for personal e-mail. She says she turned more than 30,490 work-related e-mails over to the State Department and deleted 31,830 e-mails that she deemed to be personal.

State Dept. email archiving process puts Clinton on the spot (CNN)
By Kevin Bohn
March 14, 2015
CNN

The State Department only last month started automatically preserving dozens of high-level officials' emails, according to a department spokeswoman, a revelation that comes amid the controversy surrounding former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's own email use.

This is key because Clinton, in her news conference on Tuesday to answer questions about why she exclusively used a private email address to communicate during her tenure, told reporters she'd thought her communications to senior department officials were always saved. That's an important point, given legal requirements for preserving federal records.

"In meeting the record-keeping obligations, it was my practice to email government officials on their State or dot-gov accounts so that the emails were immediately captured and preserved," she said.

The news about the State Department's archiving practices -- and the change that started in February -- could refuel the furor of Republicans over Clinton's choice to not use her government email account, to have a private server in her family home house her emails, and to decide (with her staff) which emails to delete and which to turn over to the State Department for review.

Rep. Susan Brooks, a member of the select committee investigating the 2012 Benghazi attack, said in the Republicans' weekly media address Saturday, "You see, right now there is no way for us to know whether we have all of the State Department communications that rightfully belong to the American people."

"The only way to truly know is by having access to Secretary Clinton's personal server," the Indiana Republican added. "We are asking Secretary Clinton to turn her server over to a neutral, third-party arbiter. After a complete inventory, this arbiter can make a determination as to which emails should be public and which should remain private. These decisions would be completely impartial and independent."

So far, Brooks' committee had gotten just under 300 of Clinton's emails from the State Department.

Last year, as it was trying to update its records, the State Department asked former secretaries of state for nonpersonal emails from their personal accounts that could be work-related.

That request prompted Clinton to turn over 30,490 emails -- about 55,000 pages. Clinton has asked for those emails to be made public, and department officials are reviewing them to make sure no sensitive information is released.

Clinton's office had said her account contained 62,320 sent and received emails from March 2009 to February 2013.

"About half were personal that were not in any way related to work. I had no reason to save them," Clinton said at her press conference.

The fact that all emails from senior officials weren't automatically saved until recently doesn't mean they are gone, according to the State Department.

"I wouldn't state it's lost to history, because there are always -- there are technical means of gaining access to past information," spokeswoman Jen Psaki said Friday.

At the same time, Psaki said the State Department chose to change its approach -- by automatically saving all emails -- "because it's an imperfect system."

"This is a more efficient and better way," she said of the new system. "But, obviously, there were ways to preserve (emails), and employees and individuals were expected to do that prior to this new process."

Separately, Psaki said that a letter was recently sent to former State Department staffers asking for their help in the preservation effort.

“If they should become aware ... of federal record in their possession -- such as an email sent or received on a personal email account while (they were) serving in their official capacity at the Department -- that ... record (should) be made available to the Department,” Psaki said the ex-staffers were told.

Even before last month’s chance, emails of current Secretary of State John Kerry, who uses a government address, were already being saved automatically.

GOP to Clinton: Hand over your email server (CBS News)
By Reena Flores
March 14, 2015
CBS News

Republicans are casting a wider net in their investigation of Hillary Clinton's use of a private email address during her time as secretary of state.

In the GOP's weekly address Saturday, Indiana Rep. Susan Brooks, who is a member of the House Select Committee in charge of scrutinizing the events leading up to the 2012 attack on a U.S. compound in Benghazi, Libya, is calling for Clinton to pass on the actual email server that hosted her private address, rather than just copies of the relevant electronic messages.

"Right now there is no way for us to know whether we have all of the State Department communications that rightfully belong to the American people. The only way to truly know is by having access to Secretary Clinton's personal server," Brooks said in a new video. "That is why we are asking Secretary Clinton to turn her server over to a neutral, third-party arbiter."

Citing the need for the surveyor to be "completely impartial and independent," Brooks also called on a third party to sift through the thousands of pages accumulated over Clinton's tenure in President Obama's Cabinet.

"After a complete inventory, this arbiter can make a determination as to which emails should be public and which should remain private," the Indiana congresswoman said. "By handing her server over to a neutral, third-party arbiter, Secretary Clinton can help us move forward with figuring out what happened to our people."

What this "independent" arbiter might look like is still anyone's guess. While South Carolina Rep. Trey Gowdy, who chairs the House Select Committee, and Sen. Lindsey Graham have said they've lost confidence in the State Department to make determinations about what should be made public, no formal steps have been announced for another lawyer or federal judge to handle the matter.

A neutral third-party is not entirely unheard of, but the appearance of politicizing the results could be detrimental to the integrity of the investigation itself.

The House Select Committee issued a subpoena for Clinton's emails last week following the original email revelations. The subpoena asked for "all communications of former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton related to Libya and to the State Department for other individuals who have information pertinent to the investigation," according to a committee statement.

"There are gaps of months and months and months," Gowdy said Sunday on CBS' "Face the Nation," unsatisfied with the emails his committee has received.

The subpoena drew the wrath of several Democrats on the Benghazi committee, who called the move "completely unnecessary and unfounded."

"You rushed to issue a unilateral subpoena to Secretary Clinton with no debate, no vote and no deliberation whatsoever by committee members," a letter from committee Democrats to Gowdy read.

House Democrats' quick defense of Clinton assured Gowdy that the former secretary was in full cooperation with the federal standards existing at the time.

But conservative groups are not the only ones seeking this information. Though Mr. Obama has staunchly defended Clinton's record as a Cabinet member, veterans of the Democratic Party like California Sen. Dianne Feinstein have deemed Clinton's secrecy on the matter damaging to a potential 2016 run for the White House.

"From this point on ... the silence is going to hurt her," Feinstein said last week. "She is the leading candidate, whether it be Republican or Democrat, to be the next president."

The Associated Press is additionally suing the State Department over the email controversy. The news agency filed a lawsuit last week in an attempt to force the release of Clinton's email correspondence, after repeated attempts to secure that information from numerous failed U.S. Freedom of Information Act requests.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the meantime, the State Department's own review of Clinton's emails is only in the first phases of an appraisal that could take "several months."

Despite the directives from Clinton to the State Department instructing a release of unclassified information, Republicans aren't wavering in their criticism of the former first lady.

"It was not out of a sense of transparency that she acted," Brooks charged in her address. "It was our select committee's oversight that compelled Secretary Clinton to hand over some of her e-mails."

Mr. Obama, in his own address this week, urged the nation to support a new "Student Aid Bill of Rights."

"It's a simple declaration of values - what I call a Student Aid Bill of Rights," the president said in a video. "It says that every student deserves access to a quality, affordable education. Every student should be able to access the resources to pay for college. Every borrower has the right to an affordable repayment plan. And every borrower has the right to quality customer service, reliable information and fair treatment, even if they struggle to repay their loans."

The president, who used a visit to Georgia Tech earlier this week to speak on the need for higher education accessibility, also asked Americans to sign a declaration stating those principles of affordable schooling and reasonable loan plans.

The nation's chief executive asserted his own steadfast support of higher education and also said that he would take the issue to members of Congress, as well as to leaders in the private sector.

"Making sure that students aren't saddled with debt before they even get started in life is in all our interests," the president said.

Hillary Clinton Seeks to Reassure Democrats on Email Controversy (The New York Times)
By Maggie Haberman
March 14, 2015
The New York Times

Hillary Rodham Clinton was not speaking to reporters when she gave her 21-minute news conference this week about her State Department emails. She was talking to Democratic supporters and seeking to assure them that the controversy could be easily explained.

With the Sunday news shows expected to begin a second week of focus on Mrs. Clinton's emails, her allies say that, as rusty as she was when she took reporters' questions at the United Nations, she accomplished her mission: giving Democrats something, anything, that would explain her actions.

Her late-night Twitter message a week earlier, publicly calling for the State Department to release her emails, merely raised more questions. Democrats who sought talking points were in the dark, as her growing group of advisers, including John Podesta, according to several people involved in the response effort, had said she needed to address it more forcefully.

The news conference Tuesday left many critics largely unsatisfied and clamoring for more. But Democratic voters were the the ones she hoped to reach.

"She doesn't have to convince everybody, she just has to convince most people," said Hilary Rosen, a Democratic strategist. "Most people have a reasonable test: Do you reasonably think that Hillary Clinton, as secretary of state, conducted herself with integrity and leadership and used a Blackberry with her personal address?"

Ms. Rosen added, "I think that she passed that test last week."

She pointed to the vacuum that currently exists within the party in terms of a challenger — even those few Democrats considering contesting her have barely touched the email story — and said the media is filling it.

"I don't think this story is the press's fault by any means; I do think the press has turned itself into a checks and balances," she said. "That's going to be a fact of life through this primary."

Mrs. Clinton is no stranger to addressing controversy in public. Her history is rife with examples of scandals, real or contrived, that were punctuated by belated efforts to tamp them down. When she ran for the United States Senate in 2000 from New York, she sparked a firestorm when she nodded along as Suha Arafat, the wife of the Palestinian leader Yasir Arafat, accused Israelis of poisoning Palestinian children. She later said the simultaneous translation had been off.

That moment, which occurred in November 1999, drove news cycles in the pre-social-media era, and troubled Jewish voters enough that Mrs. Clinton spent a fair amount of time reassuring potential constituents well into 2000. By Election Day, it was a distant memory.

Clinton's control issues (The Washington Post)
By Kathleen Parker
March 15, 2015
The Washington Post

On March 2, the story broke that Hillary Clinton had possibly violated e-mail regulations while secretary of state.

You could almost hear the collective gasp in Washington: Oh, no, here we go again.

But the next evening, Clinton was feted at the Emily's List 30th-anniversary gala dinner as though nothing had happened. Only the trumpets were missing from what felt like her coronation as the Democratic presidential nominee and, possibly, the next president of the United States.

Fast-forward a dozen days and Clinton's position in the presidential sweepstakes seems less assured, her inevitability not so inevitable.

The most perplexing question isn't about the e-mails themselves but why she put everything at risk over such a small detail, declining to segregate her personal and business e-mail.

There can only be one answer, and it isn't "convenience," as Clinton claims. Think of another word that begins with the letter "C": control.

Clinton claims she opted for the convenience of one cellphone and a personal server - rather than use a government-issued phone for business and another device for personal matters. Too much stuff to lug around?

So the whole question of her conduct as secretary of state boils down to a few ounces of electronic equipment. Hate to say it, but only a woman could come up with such an excuse. It's all about the purse.

Plainly, Clinton didn't want anyone snooping around her virtual file cabinet. Who does? But this isn't the point. When you are secretary of state and are mulling a run for president, you steer clear of anything and anyone remotely questionable. No one should know this better.

Questions that merit serious consideration include whether the Clinton server was secure. Clinton insists that it was because her New York home, where the server lives, is protected by the Secret Service. Given the optional sobriety of agents these days, this is less than reassuring. Then, too, hacking doesn't require on-site handling.

Here's the real muddle for Clinton. Whether her server suffered no breaches - and whether there's nothing in those 32,000 deleted personal e-mails - matters little. In politics, you're guilty as perceived. It looks bad.

Most likely this error (rather than crime) is a function of remoteness more than dishonesty. The Clintons have been around so long, they are the essence of bubble life. Removed from the hubbub of ordinary existence - escorted, driven, valeted, catered to, styled, fluffed and obeyed - being Clinton means never having to hear the word "no." It must be easy to forget that you have to live by the same rules as everyone else.

This is a concept the Clintons have never fully accepted. One can understand, given their extended public life - and the hyper-scrutiny under which they live - that they might seek to erect high walls around their private lives. Fame and celebrity breed not just insularity but also paranoia.

Maybe there's nothing of interest in those personal e-mails, but how would we know? Team Clinton handpicked the "personals" and now they're deleted, thus creating the impression that she is hiding something. The Clintons always seem to be hiding something. Not so much holding their cards close to the chest as kicking the body back behind the dust ruffle.

Even though investigations into every "gate" associated with them in the past - Travelgate, Filegate, Troopergate, you-name-it-gate - failed to produce much more than a blue dress, there seemed to be something not quite right. And now there's this. Not illegal per se but not quite right.

Clinton says she figured that, because all her communications to State Department staff went to the dot-gov server, they automatically would have gone into storage as required. True, but what about the rest? What's in those deleted e-mails? Don't we imagine that personal and business often overlap in the Clinton Rolodex?

Adding to the suspicion is that the 55,000 pages of e-mails that Clinton did turn over to the State Department surfaced only after the House select committee investigating Benghazi requested her correspondence about the attack. Would she have turned them over anyway?

Maybe. Still and again, it doesn't look good. And the entire mess serves as a reminder of a movie we've seen before - and it wasn't so great the first time. Whether this episode proves fatal remains to be seen, but we won't hear the end of it until every note of condolence, yoga date and wedding plan is known to someone other than Hillary.

Clinton easily beats any rivals in poll (Los Angeles Times)
By David Lauter
March 15, 2015
Los Angeles Times

Hillary Rodham Clinton is not only the best-known but also the most favorably viewed of the potential presidential candidates from either of the two major parties, according to a new Gallup poll.

The poll was conducted Monday through Wednesday, mostly after the news broke about Clinton's use of a private email account while she was secretary of State, but before the news conference last week in which she addressed the issue.

Roughly 9 in 10 Americans said they knew enough about Clinton to have an opinion, and the poll released Thursday found that 50% viewed her favorably, while 39% had a negative impression. On both counts, that put her in better position than any of the potential Republican candidates at this early stage of the presidential race.

But Clinton's favorability has declined since she left the State Department, as Americans have begun to see her again as a presidential candidate rather than in the less political role as the nation's top diplomat. When she left the agency, about two-thirds of Americans polled had a favorable view of her, a number that has dropped steadily as partisanship has taken its toll.

Last June, when Clinton released her book "Hard Choices," 54% of Americans in a Gallup survey had a favorable view. Comparing that number with the latest figure indicates that the email controversy had not had a significant impact on the public's perception of Clinton when the new poll was taken.

Among the Republican hopefuls, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie were the best-known, with about two-thirds of respondents holding opinions on them.

But in Bush's case, that opinion was closely divided -- 35% favorable and 33% unfavorable. Christie stood in a worse position, with negative perceptions outweighing the positive, 34% to 31%.

Among the potential contenders for the Republican nomination, Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida had the highest net favorability, with 26% holding a positive view and 21% a negative one, the poll found. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker also had a net favorable rating, but was somewhat less known, with 20% favorable and 18% unfavorable.

The least popular Republican candidates overall were former Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania and the two Texans considering running -- former Gov. Rick Perry and Sen. Ted Cruz. For Santorum, negative views outnumbered positives, 27% to 20%; for Perry it was 32% to 25%, and for Cruz, 28% to 22%.

On the Democratic side, Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, who some have hoped will challenge Clinton, had a net positive rating, but was far less known than Clinton. The poll showed 22% viewing her favorably and 19% unfavorably. Warren has repeatedly said she is not running and has taken no steps toward starting a campaign.

The Gallup survey questioned 1,522 U.S. adults by land lines and cellphones. It has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Will April bring shower of announcements? (The Hill)
By Cameron Joseph
March 14, 2015
The Hill

Get ready for April to bring a shower of presidential campaign announcements.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton (D) is moving hard towards a launch early next month, according to sources close to her team.

Republican Sens. Marco Rubio (Fla.), Ted Cruz (Texas) and Rand Paul (Ky.) are also likely to hit the launch button in the coming weeks, according to sources familiar with their plans, pushing the 2016 race into high gear in what could be a crucial month of the campaign season.
And, like most things in politics, the rush to launch is being driven mostly by finances.

April 1 marks the beginning of a new fundraising quarter, giving candidates plenty of time to build their campaign war chests before they have to report the figures publicly in July.

“It makes sense to start as early as possible to have a strong quarter. The financial challenge is so immense that you need all the time you can get,” said Texas-based GOP strategist Matt Mackowiak.

“It seems like it’s early, but as you start planning your calendar out for the rest of the year, you realize we’re a ways down the road here and you’ve got to do the things you have to do now,” he added.

Several candidates appear ready to take advantage an early announcement, giving them the full second quarter to pad their campaign coffers.

The exact timing of Clinton’s decision remains an open question, though it appears increasingly likely that she’ll move in early April.

Cruz is also expected to announce sometime early in the month, while Paul has been eying April 7 as a possible launch date for some time.

Cruz and Paul aides declined to comment to The Hill on exact timing of the campaign.

Rubio is also expected to announce as soon as April, according to sources close to the senator.

The candidates’ moves towards official campaigns, whether they claim they’re “exploratory committees” or outright declare White House runs, gives them their best chance to set their narratives and garner big media attention, making their rollouts crucial.

With so many candidates likely to announce in a tight time window, how they scrap and claw for media attention will be key.

“All these guys want to be able to post up against Hillary,” said Florida-based GOP strategist Rick Wilson, who has ties to Rubio, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R).

“If you’re Ted Cruz your mailing list is your main fundraising mechanism, and if you’re going to run a campaign off of that you have to go in saying ‘I’m your guy to take on Clinton.’ And it’s very difficult to do that without a big target like Hillary and without themselves being in the game,” Wilson noted.

Jumping in during a busy month has its risks, however.

“If Hillary does take the formal step of announcing in April, she’s going to chew up a couple of days or a week of news,” said Mackowiak. “The candidates want to have the days to themselves, so working around others’ schedules makes a lot of sense and that may require some adaptability on the Republicans’ side.”

Launching early has drawbacks, however. Candidates have to face up to the media more often once they’re in and have no excuse to duck issues or events.

They also can’t coordinate any longer with friendly super-PACs, a big reason why both Bush and Walker, who already have national fundraising networks and high name recognition, are likely to wait until the summer to officially announce.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The former Florida governor's delay also allows him to continue to work closely with his Right to Rise super-PAC to haul in big checks before he officially joins the race.

As the campaigns ramp up, there's also been a rush to snap up staff on both sides of the aisle.

Clinton has been especially busy in recent weeks, moving to pad out her national press team and early-primary state operations with a bevy of new hires.

Jesse Ferguson, who until recently was a top strategist for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, is slated to have a senior communications role in the national office, with a number of other names from the DCCC and Democratic National Committee are expected to join him in the coming weeks.

Clinton has also hired half a dozen top Democratic operatives to run her efforts in early-voting Iowa and New Hampshire including top Matt Paul, a longtime advisor to former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D), and Mike Vlacich, who ran Sen. Jeanne Shaheen's (D-N.H.) 2014 campaign.

Cruz, Rubio and Paul have all also brought on new advisors in recent weeks or shifted top strategists from their official Senate offices to the campaign side.

All those last minute moves are to ensure that their campaign apparatus will be all systems go once they officially pull the lever.

"This is like a duck: placid on the surface, busy underneath," said Wilson. "You're going to keep seeing those staff moves."

Hillary Clinton: running to win - but on her own terms (The Guardian)
By Ed Pilkington in Fayetteville, Arkansas
March 14, 2015
The Guardian

Feminist pioneer or self-interested careerist? Her closest friends, who have known her since she was lured south by boyfriend Bill, provide clues to the riddle as she prepares her bid to become America's first female president

On Thanksgiving Day in 1996, when Hillary Clinton was in the White House, she had a long conversation with her best friend, soulmate and confidante, Diane Blair. The two women had forged a relationship in the 1970s when they were both teaching in Fayetteville in Arkansas – Bill's home state – and would remain close until Blair's death from cancer in 2000.

With the blunt honesty of a trusted friend, Blair raised with Clinton one of the most vexed problems that has bedevilled her years of public service: her toxic dealings with the press. Couldn't she avoid a lot of grief, Blair suggested, by developing friendlier relations – even fake ones – with media figures? And shouldn't she stop changing her hair so often?

Blair clearly touched a nerve, provoking a defiant riposte from the first lady. In today's context, at the end of a week in which Hillary Clinton has yet again found herself face-to-face with a sceptical press demanding answers about her use of a private email address while working as America's top diplomat, her robust words almost two decades ago sound uncannily prescient.

"I'm a proud woman," Clinton began. "I'm not stupid; I know I should do more to suck up to the press. I know it confuses people when I change my hairdos. I know I have to compromise."

But then Clinton's tone suddenly shifted. "But I'm just not going to," she said. "I'm a complex person and they're just going to have to live with that. I'm used to winning, and I intend to win on my own terms."

"Win on my own terms" – the phrase would make a great title to a chronicle of the battles Clinton has fought under the public spotlight. It runs through her White House struggles to introduce healthcare reform and her war with what she famously dubbed the " vast right-wing conspiracy ". It was evident in her bruising clash with Barack Obama in her first bid for the presidency in 2008. And judging from this week's events at the UN, where she treated reporters asking about her use of a private email server while secretary of state with a dismissiveness that verged on contempt, it looks like it's becoming a storyline in the 2016 presidential campaign that she is expected to launch within weeks.

The 'Fateville' years Clinton's attitude towards the press is not the only insight that can be gleaned from the friendships that she made during her early years in Arkansas. Through Diane Blair's confidences, contained in private papers that were recently opened at the University of Arkansas in Fayetteville, and interviews with several other close friends in Fayetteville and Little Rock, seeds of many of her later achievements and troubles, strengths and flaws, can be seen to have been planted in the rich soil of Arkansas.

Saint or sinner? Feminist pioneer or self-interested careerist? Which is Hillary Clinton? Diane Blair herself pondered deeply that question, asking herself in one of her private notes why her great friend was so polarizing, why to her Hillary Clinton was "funny, wicked and wacky" yet to others she came across as "a malevolent, power-mad, self-aggrandizing shrew".

That unanswered question, so pertinent today, can to some extent be answered from Clinton's Arkansas days. Some of her most controversial qualities – her fierce guarding of her privacy, the belief in doing things her own way, her fraught relationship with money – are all visible in nascent form during the period from 1974, when she moved to Fayetteville and then Little Rock, to 1993, when she entered the White House. So too are positive attributes that in the cut-and-thrust of the news cycle rarely enjoy an airing, such as her passionate embrace of women's and children's rights, and her undiminished and unbreakable loyalty to those she loves.

Hillary Rodham was 27 when she came to Fayetteville, a progressive college town tucked in the north-west corner of the state. "Fateville", she called it, poking fun at the local southern drawl. It wasn't fate that drew her here, though, so much as the relentless charm offensive Bill Clinton waged to attract her here, drawing her away from a potentially stellar legal career on the east coast.

Jim Blair, who later married Diane (Bill, as governor, officiated at their wedding), remembers the contortions Bill got into over luring Hillary to Fayetteville: "He talked about trying to persuade his girlfriend to come to Arkansas, but if she came she would be giving up a really great political career in her own right and he was in mixed emotions about talking her into it."

Bill's tactic was to bombard Hillary with female company drawn from his circle of friends in Fayetteville where he was teaching law. "Bill called me and said: 'I want you to have her over, I want you to like her and I want her to feel welcome'," said one of those women, Margaret Whillock.

Whillock did what she was told. She invited Hillary over to a lunch of gumbo on her very first day in Fayetteville, and the chemistry worked. "We had a meeting of minds, I guess you'd say," Whillock told the Guardian. "Hillary is much warmer and thoughtful than the press or anyone else has given her credit for. You don't see that side of her."

First and foremost among the friendships Hillary made was Diane Blair, who was teaching politics at the university. The two women had much in common: they were both bookish, progressive, feminist outsiders; like Hillary, Blair was a newcomer to Arkansas, hailing from Washington DC as Hillary had from Chicago.

[Bill] talked about how if his girlfriend came, she would be giving up a really great political career

Jim Blair

The intimacy of their friendship sustained over many years rings out from the Blair papers. In correspondence, Clinton calls her friend "Missy Diane", and signs Christmas cards to her from the White House "From Potus and Flotus".

The two women regularly exchanged tips on good reads (they both loved Miss Smilla's Feeling for Snow, Memoirs of a Geisha) and sent each other cartoons for light relief. In 1996, Clinton sent her friend a strip that could be read two ways – as a reference to bovine spongiform encephalopathy then in the headlines, or as a self-deprecating dig at the first lady's own beleaguered public image. The cartoon depicted a cow lying on a psychiatrist's chair, with the caption: "I'm not a mad cow, I just have issues."

Blair reciprocated by sending Clinton a newspaper clipping about a Walmart store in Miami that had yanked T-shirts from its shelves that were deemed too political because they bore the prediction "Someday a woman will be president." "Outrage of the day, maybe the year!" Blair scrawled across the cutting.

There were moments of plaintive tenderness too. "I consider you a fellow canary," Clinton wrote in one letter. "We flap our little wings harder and harder while chirping as loudly as our voices permit about what's happening around us. Sometimes we even are heard outside our cages! I don't feel as if I have any choice but to fly straight on."

Ann Henry was another Fayetteville woman who forged a lasting bond with Clinton, helped along by their shared experiences as just about the only female lawyers in town. In October 1975, Henry hosted the reception party for Hillary and Bill's wedding at her home, feting 250 guests.

"When I first met her, she was open and direct, confident and easy to visit with; we just hit it off, and it remains that way," Henry told the Guardian.

Hillary was fired up by ideas and by causes. The three women – Ann, Diane and Hillary – would spend long hours plotting how to bring reform to Arkansas, a state that was routinely towards the bottom of national league tables for educational and other standards. "We would discuss how to improve life for students, raise education, open up opportunities for women. We were very focused," Henry said.

While at Fayetteville, Clinton set up a clinic within the law school that offered free legal advice to those who couldn't afford it, as well as the first rape hotline in the town, which still exists today. After moving to Little Rock in 1976 when Bill was elected the state's attorney general, she helped found Arkansas Advocates for Children and Families that has grown to be an influential voice.

Henry said she was struck immediately by Clinton's crystal clear sense of self. "I think she knew early on who she was and what she wanted her life to be. She was very straightforward about that."

'I'm not going to pretend to be somebody that I'm not'

When the difficulties began, as soon they would, Clinton could also draw upon a clear coping mechanism. She once confided in Henry her technique for comforting her infant daughter Chelsea at the end of a hard day. "We are going to wash off the dirt of today," Hillary would say to the little girl, "and then tomorrow will be a new day and we will stand up strong."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Rodham had her own dirt to wash off. After the wedding, she found herself at the receiving end of good ol' southern disapproval when she decided to keep her maiden name – an act that was seen as virtually seditious in unreconstructed 1970s Arkansas.

The chorus of tut-tutting reached such a volume – from small-town gossip to high politics – that her friends felt duty bound to intervene. After Bill was elected governor of the state in 1978, Ann Henry told Hillary that people were upset to receive invitations from the governor's mansion in the name of "Governor Bill Clinton and Hillary Rodham."

"For a woman to keep her maiden name in the culture of Arkansas at that time, it was a real issue," Henry said. "People took it to mean 'He's not man enough for her to take his name.' She was getting all this flak: all the men were thinking she's becoming a problem, and some of the women did too."

Jim Blair gave Hillary the same advice, though he put it more colourfully: "I told her she ought to have a ceremony on the Capitol steps and let Bill put his foot on her neck."

The name change duly followed, hastened by Bill's 1980 defeat after two years in the governor's job that came as a wake-up call to both of them. Hillary Rodham became Hillary Rodham Clinton. She threw away her austere glasses and styled her hair. Yet the experience of being forced to change her outward appearance clearly rankled with her for years afterwards. In the course of that Thanksgiving heart-to-heart with Diane Blair, she said: "I have compromised. I gave up my name, I got contact lenses. But I'm not going to pretend to be somebody that I'm not."

The kerfuffle over her name was tame compared with the storms that were to come: Whitewater, Gennifer Flowers, healthcare reform, Travelgate, the Lincoln Bedroom, Monica Lewinsky, Benghazi, the list goes on. This month alone we gained two new entries to the litany: the controversies over the Clinton Foundation's acceptance of donations from foreign governments and Hillary's private emails at the State Department.

Having met Hillary on her first day in Arkansas, Margaret Whillock has had a special perch from which to observe her friend's repeated struggles over four decades. "She's been pounded so much, it's been distressing to watch. There's always been a critic, always someone having something bad to say about her," Whillock said.

The attacks have taken a toll, Whillock said. "She is more private now, more reserved. When she has let her guard down – that's when the pounding has started up again."

Clinton's need for privacy was noted by several people, so in contrast as it is with the irrepressible effervescence of her husband. "She's a much more private person than Bill. She has a very private nature," said Ernest Dumas, a prominent local journalist and editor of a book of essays called The Clintons of Arkansas.

Bobby Roberts, who served as an adviser to Bill Clinton during his years as governor, agrees. "Bill is very gregarious, very outgoing – he was out in front of us all the time. She's not like that. Secretive is not the word – I think she's just more private, less expressive, than he is."

For Dumas, the current firestorm over Clinton's exclusive use of a private email address for all her official business as secretary of state between 2009 and 2013 was utterly in character. "The email controversy is the least surprising political storm I've ever heard," he said.

He discerns similarities between the present furore and Clinton's handling of the Whitewater affair – the real estate investment in the Ozark Mountains that she and Bill made in the 1970s that went bad, later prompting the agonizingly drawn-out Kenneth Starr investigation that sapped the energy of the Clinton presidency. By the time they signed the deal, the couple had moved to Little Rock where Hillary joined the Rose Law Firm.

At the height of the Whitewater imbroglio, she claimed some of the billing records of her Rose Law Firm had gone missing. When the paperwork turned up two years later it revealed nothing untoward, but the delay in disclosure fuelled speculation about her motives.

"Whitewater was much ado about nothing, as we learned," Dumas said. "But it would never have amounted to anything if Hillary had been a bit more open about things. If she'd turned over the records it would have put an end to it pretty early."

Clinton's hankering for privacy should not be confused with reticence. Even in those early Arkansas days, her burning desire to be out there, to call the shots, was apparent – a precursor of the overtly political role she played in the White House and her later entry into electoral politics.

“She was always involved in policy discussions,” remembers Stephen Smith, Bill Clinton’s friend and political adviser during his term as attorney general and then in his early years as governor. “Any time we had meetings to talk about policy or campaigns, she was part of the team.”

“She was the most important person in Bill Clinton’s administration, and yet you never saw her,” said Dumas.

When Bill Clinton, in his second term as governor in 1983, came to appoint a chairman to the commission he set up to reform Arkansas’ failing education system, he consulted Hillary for advice on whom to pick. She knew just the right person. “Maybe I’ll do it,” she told him.

That anecdote was related by the Clintons to Roy Reed, a former reporter for the Arkansas Gazette and the New York Times. Reed told the Guardian that he thought Hillary’s nascent political ambitions, so evident back then, originated with idealism. “She believed in better education, that came through loud and clear, and over time people started to see it as a strength.”

Clinton talked to Diane Blair about her convictions in that heart-to-heart on Thanksgiving Day. “What I really love,” the then first lady told her great friend, “is inventing policies, seeing them put into practice, making things work. I’d be happy in a little office somewhere making things happen.”

Blurring public and private It’s a long leap from that little office somewhere to the multi-billion dollar presidential campaign she is about to unleash, but perhaps a small step in terms of basic instinct.

The other ambition Clinton displayed early was to make money. As she explains in her autobiography, Living History, she saw her role in Arkansas as partly to bring in the cash.

“Money means almost nothing to Bill Clinton,” she writes, “which is just as well, because as Governor of Arkansas he never made more than $35,000 a year. I worried that … we needed to build up a nest egg.”

The self-perception is revealing. Here was Hillary, the governor’s wife and a partner in one of the most prestigious law firms in Arkansas, seeing herself as hard-up and in need of a cushion. There are echoes here of the tone-deaf comment she made last summer about being “ dead broke “ when they emerged from the White House, and her similar remark to the Observer that she and Bill were not “truly well-off”.

As it worked out, the Clintons made nothing out of Whitewater. But she did do phenomenally well out of another Arkansas investment. So well, in fact, that it too landed her in hot water. In 1978, she put $1,000 into cattle futures, and within 10 short months had netted $99,000 in profits – an enviable rate of return that was later to draw the attention of investigators in Washington.

In the current controversies over the private emails and the foreign donations, one of the charges levelled against Clinton is that within her world, within “Hillaryland” as she has called it, the public and the private are blurred. Politics, money, friendship all fuse into one.

The seed of that inclination can also be seen to have been planted in Arkansas. The cattle futures investment was arranged for her by the Clintons’ great friend, Jim Blair, Diane’s husband, who was outside counsel for Tyson Foods and was an experienced futures trader.

“It was so absurd,” Blair told the Guardian. “It never occurred to me that people would make something out of this. This was just a deal among friends. I was just trying to give her a little advice and help her make a little money, because they didn’t have any.”

Blair believes that, like Whitewater, the furore over “Cattlegate” was politically motivated. “Hardline conservatives recognised her as a real talent to change the world, and they don’t like the world to be changed,” he said.

I have compromised. I gave up my name, I got contact lenses. But I’m not going to pretend to be somebody that I’m not.

Hillary Clinton

He added: “It was hard for me to see my friends attacked like that, to think that I had done anything that would give their enemies ammunition.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Which brings us back to the beginning – the vexed relationship with her detractors in politics and the press. Diane Blair offers deep insights into her friend's agitated approach to the public. She relates how resentful Clinton feels about being in the media glare, "her total exasperation with this obsession and attention, and how hard she's finding it to conceal her contempt for it all."

Blair also captures Clinton's fear that the world is out to get her, a mistrust so intense it borders on paranoia. "Mostly, she can't figure out why those people out there are so anxious to destroy them," she writes.

That image of a woman crouched in defensive posture is as fresh today as it was when Diane Blair wrote it decades ago. We saw that woman standing in front of the cameras this week at the UN – distrust, exasperation, maybe even a hint of contempt written across her face.

As she prepares to launch her final bid to become America's first female president, the question posed by her best friend booms out loud: why funny and wacky to those who love her, yet to others a self-aggrandizing shrew? Hillary Clinton is still seeking an answer to that riddle. She's running out of time.

Today's Woman (The New Yorker)
By David Remnick
March 15, 2015
The New Yorker

Early last week, while the political world was waiting for Hillary Clinton to address the moral, diplomatic, and technological questions posed by her e-mail habits, the United Nations issued a report asserting that more than one in three women experience sexual or physical violence in their lifetimes. One in ten females under the age of twenty is subjected to "forced sexual acts." In more than thirty countries, it is not illegal for men to beat their wives. In the United States, eighty-three per cent of girls between twelve and sixteen confront sexual harassment in school. Even the earnest bureaucrats of the U.N., who tend to favor euphemism and skip over cruelties like honor killings and "corrective rape," could not help but label the rate and the variety of mayhem regularly exacted upon half of humankind as "alarmingly high."

The report went on to say that female political representation, while creeping higher, is still depressingly low—not least in the world's oldest constitutional democracy, the United States. The parliaments of South Africa, Ecuador, Finland, Senegal, Sweden, Cuba, Belgium, and Rwanda are all more than forty per cent female. The percentage of members in the U.S. House of Representatives who are women is eighteen. And, since it will soon be political high season on cable TV and at the town halls and diners of Iowa and New Hampshire, it bears repeating that no woman has ever been the President of the United States.

It was hard not to think of this status report on the condition of women in the twenty-first century while Hillary Clinton stepped into the lights before an agitated crowd of reporters at the U.N. last Tuesday. A large tapestry of "Guernica" hung behind her, and she looked no happier in that setting than the tormented figures in Picasso's image of civil war. And yet contrition was not in her plans. Instead, she chose a familiar course, offering explanations that were by turns petulant and pretzelled. Asked about the way she chose to deal with federal guidelines on e-mail when she was the Secretary of State, she said, "I opted for convenience." Clinton's further explanations were so familiar, such a ride in the Wayback Machine, that you had to wonder, Why do I suddenly feel twenty years younger yet thoroughly exhausted?

The U.N. Secretary-General's report is a progress report on the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action, which grew out of the 1995 World Conference on Women. At that conference, Clinton, as First Lady, gave an unsparing assessment of so many of the grimmer aspects of the female condition: political exclusion, discrimination, rape as a weapon of war, genital cutting, forced illiteracy, forced abortion and sterilization. She performed in a way that suggested both conviction and political talent independent of her role as the President's wife and counsellor. The speech was as eloquent in its way as Barack Obama's "race speech," in the 2008 campaign, not because of its radical originality—like Obama's, it was rooted in decades of progressive thought—but because of its potential to affect policy and mainstream opinion. "It is no longer acceptable to discuss women's rights as separate from human rights" was a message she delivered with clarity, particulars, and force.

This was one reason that the press conference last week—given, presumably, as Clinton was preparing to announce a run for the Presidency, in 2016—was so dispiriting. At that moment at the U.N., she should have been returning to those feminist themes, but she used the opportunity to claim that she was only trying to protect the sanctity of her communications about her "yoga routines," her daughter's wedding, and her mother's funeral. This was a notably transparent exploitation of gender. It's one thing for a politician to be stupid; it is quite another for her to assume that we are. And what to make of a politician who protested the war in Vietnam and investigated the Watergate scandals but now writes a valentine to Henry Kissinger in the Washington Post—a book review in which Clinton calls Kissinger "surprisingly idealistic"? The peoples of Chile, Cambodia, Argentina, Bangladesh, and East Timor surely want to know more.

As the Clinton campaign machinery creaks into motion, voters, too, will want to know more. For one thing, who will compete with her? The likeliest Republican candidates do not exactly stride the earth as political colossi. Governor Scott Walker, of Wisconsin, is fast accumulating pots of right-wing money, but that is no guarantee that he can emerge from the ideological margins. Jeb Bush only recently secured his mother's blessing to run and cannot hope to inspire a frenzy of support with the proposition that he is somewhat brighter than his retired older brother.

It is the job of the press to put pressure on power and on pretenders to power. Even in a solo primary race, reporters will scrutinize not only Hillary Clinton's record but also her hawkish foreign-policy impulses, the dealings of the Clinton Global Initiative, and the contradiction between the need to ease the inequality gap and the candidate's tropism toward big money. But, in the absence of a Democratic challenger, the pressure will never be what it ought to be.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The 2008 Democratic race was not just good sport; it also made both Obama and Clinton better. In the contest for the White House, the stakes are plain and enormous: the rights of women; the fate of the earth; the gaping disparities of income and opportunity; the stability of the Middle East, South Asia, and Europe. However vexed by the politics of gender, America is ready for a woman President. Long past ready. A female President committed to the kind of vision Clinton set out twenty years ago in Beijing could exert a powerful influence on the lives of women all over the world. But if, in the end, Hillary Clinton's only competition is herself, if all she has to contend with is the press and her less attractive instincts, she will have gained a too easy path to power at the cost of being less prepared to exercise it.

There are twenty months left before Election Day, 2016. Bush v. Clinton, the likeliest race (though don't count on it), promises endless discussion of families who are as familiar to us as the Simpsons. But where are the other candidates? What is behind the national impoverishment of political talent? Isn't there a chance that the greatest nostalgia we might feel, come primary season, is not for earlier iterations of the Clintons and the Bushes but for the President who has not yet finished his time in office?

Clinton Unveils Far-Reaching Climate Change Plan // NYT // Trip Gabriel and Coral Denport - July 26, 2015

Promising more than a half-billion solar panels by the end of a first term and an ambitious target of clean energy for every home in America in a decade, Hillary Rodham Clinton unveiled goals on Sunday evening to reduce the threat of climate change.

She said she would continue President Obama's sweeping plan to limit carbon emissions from power plants, and announced targets that even push beyond current goal's for greenhouse gases.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Obama's proposed regulations are expected to be finalized by the Environmental Protection Agency in August, and the real work of making the changes — shutting down coal plans and increasing the number of renewable electricity sources — would fall to the next administration.

The Clinton campaign said the goals, set out on its website in a video, were the first of a six-plank plan to address climate change that Mrs. Clinton would continue to unveil in coming weeks and months.

Other areas of focus will be improving the efficiency of buildings, ensuring that fossil fuel production is "safe and responsible," and protecting financial markets from climate-related risks.

In the video and at an earlier event, Mrs. Clinton said that critics of taking strong action, who include most of the Republican presidential candidates, were ignoring the seriousness of the threat.

"Those people on the other side, they will answer any question about climate change by saying, 'I'm not a scientist,'" Mrs. Clinton said in Ames, Iowa on Sunday. "Well I'm not a scientist either. I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain."

Mrs. Clinton also promised to help any workers who lose their jobs as coal plants respond to Mr. Obama's plan to limit carbon emissions. Appalachia, once a bastion of Democratic support, has been hostile to Mr. Obama for what officials like Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican majority leader, call a "war on coal."

"I will be very clear, I want to do more to help in coal country," Mrs. Clinton said at the event. She expressed gratitude to men "who mined the coal that created industrial revolution that turned on the lights that fueled the factories, who lost their lives, who were grievously injured, who developed black lung disease."

Mrs. Clinton's pledge to produce "enough renewable energy to power every American home within 10 years of taking office" — that is, by 2027 — is even more ambitious than Mr. Obama's plan.

The president has pledged to get the United States to produce 20 percent of electricity from renewable sources by 2030 — essentially tripling renewable power from today.

Mrs. Clinton's plan would arrive at 33 percent, said Heather Zichal, who served as Mr. Obama's senior climate change adviser until last year.

"I think this initial statement from her is a strong signal that she's committed to a thoughtful policy that pushes the envelope," she said.

Mrs. Clinton's rollout of a climate plan, the latest in a series of policy agendas, was in part intended to counter the threat on her left from Bernie Sanders, the Vermont senator who draws thunderous cheers at rallies when he calls for the immediate action on the warming climate. And unlike Mr. Sanders, Mrs. Clinton has not clearly stated whether she opposes building the Keystone XL pipeline, which has become the leading rallying cry of grass-roots environmentalists.

On Friday, Tom Steyer, the billionaire climate activist, said that in order to receive his backing and financial support, a candidate would have to pledge to enact an energy policy that would lead to the generation of half the nation's electricity from renewable or zero-carbon sources by 2030, and 100 percent by 2050.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Martin O'Malley, the former governor of Maryland who is also seeking the Democratic nomination, has already put forth such a plan.

In a statment, Mr. Steyer praised Mrs. Clinton's proposal without offering explicit financial support. "Today, Hillary Clinton emerged as a strong leader in solving the climate crisis and ensuring our country's economic security," he said.

Hillary Clinton lays out climate change initiative // WaPo // Vanessa Williams - July 26, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton called for harnessing the power of the sun to generate enough renewable energy to run every home in the country within the next decade, as part of a climate change initiative announced Sunday.

"Future generations will look back and wonder, 'What were we thinking? How could we possibly be so irresponsible?' " the Democratic presidential candidate says in a video that accompanied the plan, which was posted on her Web site Sunday night.

"I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain and I know what's happening in the world will affect my daughter and especially my granddaughter," she said.

In addition to touting her plan, which would include installing more than half a billion solar panels nationwide during the first term of her presidency, Clinton criticized the Republican presidential candidates, who generally dismiss the notion of climate change.

"It's hard to believe that people running for president refuse to believe the settled science of climate change," she says in the video as quotes attributed to GOP hopefuls fill the screen. One such quote, attributed to former Florida governor Jeb Bush, reads: "I'm a skeptic. I'm not a scientist."

Earlier Sunday, while campaigning in Iowa, she used the "grandmother with two eyes and a brain" quip, receiving chuckles and applause. She praised Iowa's efforts to embrace renewable energy, noting that the state produces 30 percent of its energy from wind. Windmills are a common sight on the horizon across the state.

A fact sheet on the plan presented on her Web site said that Clinton will fight efforts to roll back the Clean Power Plan. And she proposes a Clean Power Challenge, including competitions for grants for renewal energy products, as well as more assistance to states and cities and more choices for consumers.

Clinton is scheduled to discuss the plan during a speech Monday in Des Moines.

Two reasons why Hillary Clinton's first climate change proposal is much more modest than it sounds // WaPo / / Philip Bump – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton announced the first "pillar" of her energy and climate agenda on Sunday, outlining a proposal to increase the number of solar panels to 500 million by the end of her first term -- and to have enough renewable power generation to provide electricity to every home in America by 2027.

The proposals, particularly the latter, are striking. The main challenge of climate change is that the world (and the United States morseo than many places) is dependent on burning fossil fuels for electricity. Burning those fuels releases carbon dioxide into the atmosphere, which traps heat. So moving the country to renewable energy sources, like wind and solar, can reduce the amount of greenhouse gases emitted and therefore stop exacerbating the problem.

So why is this not as impressive a proposal as it might at first seem?

1. Residential electricity usage is only part of the problem.

Data from the Energy Information Administration suggests that residences consume less than half of the electricity sold in the country. Clinton's proposal doesn't suggest that every house will use renewable power; just that the capacity exists.

So a lot of electricity will still be generated the old-fashioned way. And while the fracking boom has helped increase the amount of natural gas that's used in production -- better once burned than coal, but potentially problematic when extracted -- we still rely heavily on coal for our power.

2. Hitting that solar growth target is hard -- but not as hard as you might think.

Here's how much solar energy the residential sector has added over the past few years, thanks to improvements in generation, decreases in panel pricing, and a robust private sector push for installation.

That's helped boost the amount of renewable electricity used in the residential sector overall.

Can we increase solar usage 700 percent? Vox's Brad Plumer figures that the spike in solar usage puts the figure "within the realm of possibility." Solar has the benefit of being scalable on an individual level, which means that some organizing can help. And studies have found that solar power adoption is contagious.

But despite the recent growth, as the chart above shows, solar is still a tiny part of the overall energy mix. In recent years, far larger growth in renewable power generation has been in wind.

The new proposal is only the first pillar, we'll note, so we'll set aside the fact that this doesn't address other large sources of greenhouse gas emissions, like gasoline and diesel fuels.

For those eager to hail Clinton as a champion of the environment, a third note of caution from a press conference today. On one of the top issues for environmental activists, Clinton doesn't have any proposals at all.

Hillary Clinton Sidesteps Keystone in Climate Plan Rollout // WSJ // Colleen McCain Nelson – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton pledged to make combating climate change a central focus of the 2016 presidential campaign, saying Monday that she would not allow “deniers” to thwart progress or prevent the U.S. from leading on the issue.

While Mrs. Clinton cast herself as a crusader for clean energy, she declined to weigh in on a key environmental debate, taking no position on whether to build the Keystone XL pipeline. At an event in Iowa touting her climate plan, Mrs. Clinton said that as secretary of state, she set in motion the review evaluating the pipeline and now would allow her successor, John Kerry, and President Barack Obama to make the final decision.

Donald Trump Tops GOP Field in New Hampshire, Second in Iowa: Poll

"I will refrain from commenting because I had a leading role in getting that process started," Mrs. Clinton said. "And I think that we have to let it run its course."

Many Republicans have expressed skepticism about the science of climate change, with some questioning whether it's real and others doubting that human activity plays a role in global warming — or could play a role in reversing it.

The Keystone XL pipeline, which would move oil from Canada's oil sands to refineries along the U.S. Gulf Coast, has emerged as a touchstone issue for environmentalists, as well as the energy industry.

Democratic presidential candidates Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders have been vocal opponents of the project. Mrs. Clinton said her Democratic rivals never served as secretary of state and added that she is confident Keystone's impact on greenhouse gas emissions would be a major factor in the administration's determination of whether to build the pipeline.

Lis Smith, Mr. O'Malley's deputy campaign manager, said Monday: "Every Democrat should follow [Mr. O'Malley's] lead and take a stand to commit to ending our reliance on fossil fuels."

Mrs. Clinton said she's committed to making the U.S. a "clean-energy superpower" and that on day one of her presidency, she would begin work on two key goals: installing more than half a billion solar panels by the end of her first term and generating enough renewable energy to power every home in the country within a decade. Mr. Obama put the county on a path to a clean-energy future, she said, but more needs to be done.

"The reality of climate change is unforgiving no matter what the deniers say," Mrs. Clinton said. "This is one of the most urgent threats of our time, and we have no choice but to rise and meet it."

The Republican National Committee on Monday deemed Mrs. Clinton's climate policy vague and costly.

"Hillary Clinton's energy 'plan' is to raise more taxes and double down on President Obama's EPA overreach, which held down wages and cost American jobs," RNC spokesman Michael Short said. "Clinton avoided specifics and refused to take a position on important job-creating energy projects like the Keystone Pipeline, reminding voters why they think she's untrustworthy."

Mrs. Clinton did not detail how, exactly, she would pay for her clean-energy proposals. She said she would offer more specifics in the future and that some of these initiatives would pay for themselves.

Mr. Obama has faced strong resistance in Congress to his climate agenda and largely has relied on executive actions to rein in carbon emissions. Mrs. Clinton said she may pursue a similar strategy but added that addressing climate change should be a nonpartisan issue.

"We still have a lot that we can do without getting congressional support," Mrs. Clinton said. "However, it is in everybody's interest. This is not a Republican or Democratic problem."

Hillary Clinton Previews Plans to Combat Climate Change // WSJ // Colleen McCain Nelson - July 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton on Sunday offered a preview of her plans to combat climate change, pledging to set high goals and build a clean-energy economy.

At an organizing event in Iowa, Mrs. Clinton swiped at Republicans who question the threat posed by climate change and said she was serious about addressing the issue.

“Those people on the other side, they will answer any question about climate change by saying I’m not a scientist,” she said. “I’m not a scientist either—I’m just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain…I know that if we start addressing it, we’re going to actually be creating jobs and new businesses.”

The Clinton campaign is expected to release more details about her climate policy Sunday evening, and she will deliver a speech about her plan Monday morning in Des Moines.

Mrs. Clinton has previously characterized climate change as an urgent threat and has voiced support for President Barack Obama’s executive actions to limit carbon pollution.

She has stayed silent, though, on the question of whether the Keystone XL pipeline should be built, declining to weigh in on what has been a contentious yearslong debate. Mrs. Clinton oversaw the Obama administration’s review of the project during her tenure as secretary of state.

She made no mention of Keystone on Sunday but called for an emphasis on generating more wind and solar energy. Mrs. Clinton called for a rebalancing of tax incentives, which she said are too heavily weighted toward fossil fuels.

“Our politics are imprisoned by the past,” she said.

Democratic presidential candidates Martin O’Malley and Bernie Sanders have been unequivocal in their opposition to Keystone and have made climate policy a central component of their campaigns.

Mr. O’Malley has laid out an aggressive plan for combating climate change, calling for the U.S. to transition to 100% clean energy by 2050. Mr. O’Malley, the former governor of Maryland, has called for federal legislation capping carbon emissions and has pledged to reject the Keystone XL pipeline and deny new permits for drilling in Alaska and Antarctica.

Mr. Sanders, an independent senator from Vermont who is running in the Democratic primary, has been a vocal opponent of the pipeline, which has been under review by the Obama administration for more than six years. He has urged “bold action” and has said the U.S. needs to accelerate technological progress to generate more solar and wind energy.

Mrs. Clinton’s rollout of a plan to address climate change comes on the heels of billionaire climate-change activist Tom Steyer calling for 2016 candidates to develop concrete plans to increase the share of clean energy in the U.S.’s power generation mix to 50% by 2030.

Mr. Steyer, who spent $73 million during the 2014 midterm elections, has set a high bar for winning his support in 2016. A spokesperson for his advocacy group, NextGen Climate, on Friday said candidates who don't embrace Mr. Steyer's goal aren't likely to be backed by the organization.

In Iowa, Clinton says climate plan will promote renewables // AP // Thomas Beaumont - July 26, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton unveiled Sunday a plan aimed at combating climate change that includes proposed revisions in the tax code to promote renewable energy and goals for renewable sources for consumer electricity.

In Iowa, the nation's second-leading wind energy producer, Clinton said people are "just not paying attention" if they don't acknowledge climate change.

"This is not complicated folks," the former secretary of state told more than 200 people at Iowa State University. "I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain. And I know we're facing huge problem."

Climate change has become a key issue in the Democratic presidential primary, where Clinton is the heavy favorite.

Billionaire Tom Steyer has led an effort to promote the issue. The California-based Steyer hosted a fundraiser for Clinton in May.

Clinton proposes, through tax incentives, to increase the amount of power derived from renewable sources to support every home in the United States within 10 years.

For instance, Clinton said she supports renewing the wind energy tax credit as part of over time shifting the U.S. energy system from one based on fossil fuels.

"We need to get the incentives fixed in our tax system which as you know are too heavily weighted toward fossil fuels," Clinton said during a day of campaigning in central Iowa.

Clinton also hinted that her plans would impose changes on the coal industry, though she also pledged the government's help for workers to make the transition.

"We can make a transition over time from a fossil fuel economy, predominantly, to a clean renewable energy economy, predominantly," Clinton said later during an event at a central Iowa rural home.

Weaning the country off of coal is a tricky political position in key places on the political battleground map. Southeast Ohio and western Pennsylvania are regions of states that have been pivotal in recent elections. And they remain the home of key coal-producing areas.

Crediting coal-miners for having "created an industrial revolution," Clinton said "it is important that we help them transition to a new economy."

Clinton's plan also includes the goal of installing 500 million solar panels within four years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It would also increase capacity to the nation's power grid with a combination of renewable energy sources such as wind, solar, hydroelectric and geothermal.

Clinton did not include a price tag for the plan or describe how it would be financed.

Clinton was scheduled to discuss the plan in detail during a public event in Des Moines Monday morning.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, also seeking the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, noted Sunday that he unveiled a climate change plan in Iowa that addresses not just consumer energy use, but industrial and transportation, as well.

As governor, O'Malley doubled Maryland's renewable fuel production, and reduced greenhouse gases in the state by 10 percent during his two terms.

Clinton offers energy plans, declines comment on pipeline // AP // Catherine Lucey – July 27, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton is detailing new energy proposals in Iowa to address climate change. She calls global warming one of the "most urgent threats of our time."

But she's still not taking a position on the Keystone XL oil pipeline.

The Democratic presidential contender is proposing that every home in the United States be powered by renewable sources by 2027. Her plan calls for installation of 500 million solar panels over four years.

Clinton laid out clean-energy ideas during a tour of a regional bus station in Des Moines, Iowa, on Monday.

When asked about the Keystone XL oil pipeline opposed by environmental activists, she would not comment except to say she wants a State Department review of the project to run its course.

Hillary Clinton rolls out climate agenda // Politico // Darren Goode and Hadas Gold - July 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton unveiled her most detailed proposals on climate change since becoming a presidential candidate, calling for moving the economy on “a path towards deep decarbonization by 2050” and “enough clean renewable energy to power every home in America” by 2027.

Progressives have been badgering Clinton to take a strong stance on climate change. Earlier this month in New Hampshire a group of activists disrupted her first town hall in the state, demanding she pledge to end extraction of fossil fuels on public lands.

The plan is the most specific that Clinton’s made yet as a candidate on how she would combat climate change, she and though she has often been outflanked on the left by her Democratic challengers, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But on Sunday evening she won praise from billionaire climate-change activist Tom Steyer, who last week called on presidential candidates to embrace a goal of generating 50 percent of the nation's power from carbon-free sources by 2030 with an eye toward "a completely clean energy economy" by 2050.

Clinton spokesperson Brian Fallon said that the plan Clinton laid out is the equivalent of 33 percent of power coming from green energy sources like solar, wind and geothermal by 2027, which when coupled with nuclear power, exceeds Steyer's 2030 goal.

In a statement after Clinton's plan emerged, Steyer said the Democratic front runner had "emerged as a strong leader" in addressing climate change.

"Clinton laid out an ambitious framework to put our nation on a path to a clean energy economy that will create millions of jobs—and in the coming months we look forward to hearing more details about her proposals to tackle climate change," he said.

Clinton's plan calls for having 500 million solar panels installed by the end her term if she's elected president. That would be part of the effort to hike solar capacity to 140 gigawatts by the end of 2020, the equivalent of about 140 nuclear reactors and an increase of 700 percent from current levels.

She also wants to add more power generation from other renewable sources, like wind and geothermal.

Clinton called for extending federal clean energy tax incentives, and she pledged to defend the Obama Clean Power Plan, which would cut greenhouse gases from power plants. She also would launch a "Clean Energy Challenge" that would award competitive grants and other incentives for states.

Her campaign will roll out out a more detailed energy and climate strategy in the coming months that will call for reducing oil consumption, modernize the nation's energy infrastructure, improve building efficiency and "protect the health and retirement security" of coal miners.

In a speech on Sunday in a ballroom at the Iowa State University alumni center, Clinton was bullish on her climate change goals.

"I am setting some really high goals that we are going to meet when I am president," Clinton said, noting that just as many people work in the solar power sector as do in the coal industry.

"Those people on the other side, they will answer any question about climate change by saying 'I'm not a scientist,'" she continued. "I'm not a scientist either. I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain."

Clinton also unveiled a new video on Sunday hitting Republicans for denying climate change.

"Future generations will look back and say 'what were we thinking? How could we be so irresponsible,'" Clinton says in the video.

In one clip, quotes from Republican candidates such as Jeb Bush, Rand Paul, Ted Cruz, Marco Rubio and Donald Trump denying climate change appear on the screen as Clinton says "It's hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change."

On Monday, Clinton will speak about her climate change plan at a Des Moines Area Regional Transit Authority station.

Two of Clinton's primary challengers, O'Malley and Sanders, have sought to outflank her on the left on climate change.

Sanders has noted his views on climate and staunch opposition to building of the Keystone XL oil pipeline as two areas his record is distinguishable from Clinton's.

O'Malley's campaign released a preemptive strike via email Sunday afternoon, touting his signing into law as governor a statewide target of reducing total greenhouse gas emissions by 25 percent by 2020.

O'Malley, who is running a distant third in the Democratic race, is also pushing for electricity to be solely derived from renewable sources by 2050. That's the exact same pledge Steyer is seeking from 2016 presidential candidates, but Steyer has also already held a fundraiser for Clinton at his San Francisco home.

Hillary Clinton Vows to Defend, Extend Obama Climate Policy // Bloomberg // Mark Drajem - July 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton said she would both defend and go beyond the efforts by President Barack Obama to address climate change in the first detailed description of her potential environmental polices if elected president.

Clinton released what her campaign said was the opening salvo of the Democrat's energy and climate change agenda Sunday, while she was campaigning in Iowa.

Among other things, Clinton pledged to defend from legal or political attack the Obama administration's rule to cut carbon pollution from the nation's fleet of power plants.

A Clinton administration would go further, rewarding communities that speed rooftop solar panel installation, backing a contest for states to go beyond the minimums called for in the environmental rules, and boosting solar and wind production on federal lands.

A four-page campaign fact sheet said the goal was to increase the share of U.S. power generation from renewable sources to 33 percent by 2027, compared to 25 percent under Obama's carbon plan.

The announcement "makes it more clear than ever that she cares deeply about climate change and will make it a top priority throughout her campaign," Tiernan Sittenfeld, senior vice president of the League of Conservation Voters Action Fund, said in a statement.

State Mandates

The majority of U.S. states had already established their own renewable power goals by 2012, according to the federal Energy Information Administration.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

California has a goal of buying 33 percent of its power from renewable energy resources by 2020. The state describes this renewables portfolio standard on its website as “one of the most ambitious” in the country.

The early announcement of Clinton’s climate plan contrasts with the last presidential election cycle, in which neither major-party nominee highlighted the issue. Environmental advocates started a social media effort to try to get both campaigns to at least talk about the the climate.

Since winning re-election, Obama has made fighting climate a top priority and introduced a series of measures. He said this month that getting a global deal on cutting greenhouse-gas emissions is the remaining top priority of his tenure.

The mix of policies laid out by Clinton include a pledge to produce enough renewable energy in a decade to power every U.S. home, and to curb gasoline demand, neither an easy task. U.S. gasoline usage is up this year, as lower prices boost driving. The campaign’s plans don’t include any actions aimed specifically at helping oil, natural gas or coal producers.

Clinton said she would help coal-dependent communities, such as those in West Virginia or eastern Kentucky, cope with the transition away from the carbon-heavy fuel. Obama had made a similar pledge in his most recent budget.

Hillary Clinton Outlines 'Bold' Climate Change Proposals // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein - July 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton on Sunday set two "bold national goals" to combat climate change, promising that if she's elected president, she would set the United States on a path toward producing enough clean renewable to power every home in America within a decade.

She would also initiate a process that would bring the total number of solar panels installed nationwide to more than half a billion before the end of her first term, her campaign said in a fact sheet released Sunday as it also posted a video in which Clinton lays out her ambitions.

"We cannot wait any longer" to act on climate change, the Democratic front-runner says in the video. "It's time we stand for a healthier climate, stand for cleaner air, for science, for innovation, for our children, for reality, for the future."

Sunday's announcement and an accompanying speech set for Monday at the LEED Platinum-certified Des Moines Area Regional Transit Central Station are intended as a first step in framing Clinton's views on climate and energy issues. More details about her specific positions and policy areas not discussed will be unveiled in the coming months, the campaign said.

Clinton's unveiling of her big-picture views on renewable energy while visiting Iowa is no accident. The state produces nearly a quarter of the nation's ethanol and is building a growing number of wind farms. Twenty-eight percent of Iowa's power comes from wind, and the state trails only Texas in wind power production. The dominance of renewable energy industries in the state makes it a key political issue, one on which Clinton believes her views align not only with Democrats but with most voters.

In the video, Clinton hints at Republicans who, to varying degrees, deny the existence of climate change while the screen populates with quotes from former Florida Governor Jeb Bush ("I'm a skeptic. I'm not a scientist."), Kentucky Senator Rand Paul ("It's absolutely and utterly untrue.") and Donald Trump ("Hoax"), among others.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Those people on the other side, they will answer any question about climate change by saying, 'I’m not a scientist,'" Clinton said Sunday while speaking at Iowa State University in Ames, before adding a laugh-line that she also uses in the video. "Well, I’m not a scientist either. I’m just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain."

If elected, Clinton would fight back against Republican efforts to demolish the Environmental Protection Agency's Clean Power Plan, a set of regulations on greenhouse gas emissions expected to be finalized in the coming days or weeks. Those rules and others "set the floor, not the ceiling," the campaign said in its fact sheet, and Clinton would aim to encourage innovation with a Clean Energy Challenge for states, cities and rural communities to get federal support for clean energy programs.

Clinton supports extending and adding to existing tax credits to encourage the production and use of energy from renewable sources, as well as the expansion of the production and use of renewable energy on public lands and in federal buildings.

One concern that contributes to opposition—from Republicans and from some Democrats who represent coal country—to the expansion of the clean energy and the phasing out of the use of coal is what happens to all the people who work in the industry. But, Clinton said Sunday in Ames, she would focus resources on aiding regions already in decline because of the diminishing role of coal. “I will be very clear: I want to do more to help in coal country," she said.

About a dozen orange-shirted members of NextGen Climate Iowa, the state branch of the super-PAC founded and funded by billionaire investor and climate activist Tom Steyer, watched Clinton speak on Sunday and then waited in line to pose for a group photo with Clinton. Steyer is using his wealth to support candidates and groups that back his approach to climate change, and has already given the primary maximum $2,700 to Clinton and hosted a fundraiser for her at his San Francisco home.

On Friday, he said that candidates who he supports must have concrete plans for making clean energy at least half the overall power supply generated in the United States by 2030. Steyer is also opposed to the construction of the Keystone XL oil pipeline.

Clinton has repeatedly avoided taking a position on whether Keystone should be approved by the Obama administration, saying she wants to let the State Department-led process run its course without her interference. Others running for the Democratic presidential nomination, though, have been more clear, going right for the liberal activist base that has rallied against the project in what's become a symbolic fight for both sides. Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley both say they're opposed to the pipeline and have attacked Clinton for not doing the same.

“I have helped lead the opposition against the Keystone pipeline,” Sanders told reporters earlier this month as Clinton visited Democratic lawmakers on Capitol Hill. “I don’t believe we should be excavating or transporting some of the dirtiest fuel on this planet. I think Secretary Clinton has not been clear on her views on that issue.”

O'Malley's campaign, meanwhile, prebutted Clinton's Sunday announcement with a memo on "what real climate leadership looks like" that recaps his opposition to Keystone and to offshore and Arctic drilling, as well as his proposals to create millions of jobs by boosting the clean energy industry.

The initial reaction from climate groups to Clinton's framework was positive. "“Secretary Clinton’s spot-on video makes it more clear than ever that she cares deeply about climate change and will make it a top priority throughout her campaign," League of Conservation Voters senior vice president for government affairs Tiernan Sittenfeld said in a statement. "Her goals of getting to 500 million solar panels by 2020 and ensuring that we are producing enough renewable energy to power every home in America in ten years display the kind of leadership we need to ensure that our nation leads the world in building a clean energy economy."

Hillary Clinton Declines to Say Where She Stands on Keystone XL // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton declined Monday to weigh in on the Obama administration's ongoing deliberations over the Keystone XL oil pipeline, avoiding an issue that has become a litmus test for climate activists.

After launching the first part of her agenda aimed at combating climate change, the former secretary of state told reporters in Iowa she "will refrain from commenting [on Keystone] because I had a leading role in getting that process started and we have to let it run its course."

Clinton said that during her time as President Barack Obama's top diplomat, she "put together a very thorough, deliberative, evidence-based process to evaluate the environmental impact" of the proposed pipeline, which would run from Alberta, Canada, to Nebraska.

Before launching her presidential campaign, Clinton refused to comment on the pipeline permit approval process, saying she didn't want to preempt or influence the process. Monday was the first time she'd been asked since entering the race in April.

Other candidates running for the Democratic nomination have seized on Clinton's caution and attacked her for refusing to take a definitive stance.

"I have helped lead the opposition against the Keystone pipeline," Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders said earlier this month as Clinton visited Democratic lawmakers on Capitol Hill. "I don't believe we should be excavating or transporting some of the dirtiest fuel on this planet. I think Secretary Clinton has not been clear on her views on that issue."

Minutes after Clinton spoke Monday, Democratic presidential candidate and former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley's campaign criticized Clinton for what it described as a lack of leadership. "Governor O'Malley is opposed to the Keystone XL pipeline because we can't move to a clean energy future if we continue to rely on dirty, short-term fossil fuel fixes," deputy campaign manager Lis Smith said in a statement. "Real leadership is about forging public opinion on issues like Keystone—not following it. Every Democrat should follow his lead and take a stand to commit to ending our reliance on fossil fuels."

Clinton acknowledged that the pipeline is a politicized issue and stressed that she is in a unique position.

"No other presidential candidate was secretary of state when this process started," she said.

Hillary Clinton sets renewable energy goals to spur more wind, solar power // Reuters // Alana Wise - July 26, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton called on Sunday for a dramatic national shift to energy sources such as solar and wind, setting a goal of generating enough clean renewable energy to power every U.S. home within a decade after she takes office.

Clinton, the front-runner for her party's 2016 presidential nomination, also pledged to have more than half a billion solar panels installed nationwide within four years of taking office.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I want more wind, more solar, more advanced biofuels, more energy efficiency," Clinton said at a rally on Sunday in Ames, Iowa. "And I've got to tell you, people who argue against this are just not paying attention."

The two goals, announced in a video on Sunday night, were the first elements of what Clinton said would be a comprehensive climate-change agenda to be released over the next few months.

Clinton has been under pressure from Democratic presidential rival Senator Bernie Sanders, a self-styled socialist who has called for swift action on climate change, and environmental activists anxious to see her spell out details of a climate plan.

Her campaign said the goals would lead to a 700 percent increase in the nation's installed solar capacity from current levels, and eventually could lead to the generation of at least one third of all electricity from renewable sources.

Clinton also called for extending federal clean energy tax incentives and making them more cost effective. In Ames, Clinton said she would continue the wind production tax credit and recalibrate other tax incentives that are "too heavily weighted ... toward fossil fuels."

Clinton also said she would fight efforts to roll back President Barack Obama's executive actions to curb carbon emissions from power plants. She said the actions could build a "clean energy economy" that would bolster growth.

"If we start addressing it, we're going to actually be creating jobs and new businesses," she said.

Clinton will discuss the proposals on Monday at an energy-efficient transit station in Iowa, the state that kicks off the 2016 presidential nominating race and is a leading wind energy producer.

Clinton praised Iowa for promoting wind energy and advanced biofuels, and for establishing state tax rebates for installing solar panels in homes and businesses.

She criticized Republicans who are reluctant to say climate change is a man-made phenomenon.

"They will answer any question about climate change by saying: 'I'm not a scientist.' Well, I'm not a scientist either. I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain and I know we're facing a huge problem," Clinton said.

Clinton vows to boost U.S. clean energy use in response to climate change // Reuters // Alana Wise – July 27, 2015

U.S. presidential candidate Hillary Clinton on Monday described climate change as "one of most urgent threats of our time" and vowed to meet the challenge with a plan to generate enough clean energy to power every U.S. home by 2027.

The Democratic front-runner compared fighting climate change to the race to put an American on the moon by the end of the 1960s.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The next decade will be as decisive for climate change as the decade for getting to the moon was for space exploration," Clinton said at a campaign stop in Iowa, which will hold the first presidential nominating contest in February.

"Sea levels are rising, ice caps are melting, storms, wildfires and extreme weather are wreaking havoc. This is one of most urgent threats of our time and we have no choice but to rise and meet it," said Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic nomination in the November 2016 election.

Clinton promised to have more than half a billion solar panels installed nationwide within four years if she makes it to the White House.

The former secretary of state has been under pressure from Democratic presidential rival Senator Bernie Sanders, a self-described socialist who has called for swift action on climate change, and environmental activists anxious to see her spell out details of a climate plan.

She vowed to "stop the giveaways to big oil companies" and to defend President Barack Obama's plan to reduce emissions from power plants, which is hitting the coal industry.

More details of Clinton's climate change agenda will be released over the next few months.

The Republican National Committee said Clinton's energy policies were vague and aimed at distracting attention from the controversy of her use of a private email account while she ran the State Department.

"Hillary Clinton's energy 'plan' is to raise more taxes and double down on President Obama's EPA overreach, which held down wages and cost American jobs. Clinton avoided specifics and refused to take a position on important job-creating energy projects like the Keystone pipeline, reminding voters why they think she's untrustworthy," said RNC spokesman Michael Short.

Hillary Clinton pushes renewable energy with focus on solar // CNN // Dan Merica – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton pledged Sunday that as president she would put the United States on a path toward generating enough renewable energy to power every home in the country by 2027 - ten years after she would hypothetically take office.

In a video posted to her campaign website, Clinton knocked Republicans for refusing "to accept the settled science of climate change" and cast her push as a fight for children and grandchildren.

"I am just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain and I know what is happening in the world is going to have a big effect on my daughter and especially my granddaughters," Clinton said, using a line she often delivers at campaign events. "You don't have to be a scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all. You just have to be willing to act."

The video - titled "Stand for Reality" - featured a slate of quotes from Republicans on climate change, including when former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush told Esquire Magazine in 2009, "I'm a skeptic. I'm not a scientist." The slate also included quotes from Sens. Marco Rubio, Ted Cruz and Rand Paul.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"You don't have to be a scientist to accept scientific evidence," Clinton tweeted. "Climate change is real and we must act. -H."

Clinton's plan focuses largely on residential power usage and is buoyed by a focus on solar. By the end of her hypothetical first term as president, Clinton promised that the United States would have more than 500 million solar panels installed across the country.

The presidential candidate also stressed building an energy grid more focused on renewable energy, particularly solar, by the end of the decade. According to a fact sheet circulated by Clinton's campaign, a Clinton presidency would hope to increase output of solar energy by 700% by the end of the decade.

On Monday, Clinton will expand on her clean energy push in Iowa when she tours that LEED Platinum certified Des Moines Area Regional Transit (DART) Central Station.

Clinton's said he plan would incentivize investment in renewables by increasing the number of government grants for clean energy, extending federal clean energy tax incentives and expanding renewable energy on public lands.

"The decisions we make in the next decade can make all of this possible. Or, they can keep us trapped in the past," Clinton says in the video. "We cannot wait any longer. It is time we stand for healthier climate, stand for cleaner air, for science, for innovation, for our children. For reality, for the future."

The former secretary of state's clean energy pitch comes at a time where many Democrats are focused on climate change, particularly the need to decrease the use of fossil fuels. According to the World Bank, over 85% of U.S. energy consumption came from fossil fuels.

Clinton was confronted by climate change protestors at a town hall earlier this month in New Hampshire. The former secretary of state was first asked a "yes or no" question about banning the extraction of fossil fuels from public grounds. Clinton did not give the protestors the answer they wanted, telling them she would not ban the practice until alternatives were in place.

According to the fact sheet, Clinton does not rule out using federal land for fossil fuel development, but says that she would ensure "taxpayers get a fair deal for development on public lands, and that areas that are too sensitive for energy production are taken off the table."

Some of Clinton's top supporters have also been outspoken on the need for 2016 Democrats to tackle climate change.

Tom Steyer, a hedge fund billionaire and the head of NextGen Climate, a non-profit focused on climate change, issued an open letter on Friday that called for all 2016 Democrats to "lay out a clear and concrete plan to achieve at least 50 percent clean or carbon-free energy by 2030."

"Whether or not candidates make this commitment will be a critical factor for Americans who are deciding what candidates to support at polls," wrote Steyer, who has already hosted a fundraiser for Clinton at his home in California.

week.

Clinton's campaign claimed Sunday that their plan matches the Steyer pledge, but a supportive statement from the environmentalist did not outright say Clinton's plan met his standards.

He did call the plan "an ambitious framework to put our nation on a path to a clean energy economy," adding that Clinton "emerged as a strong leader in solving the climate crisis and ensuring our country's economic security" due to the proposal.

Campaign aides stressed that Sunday's announcement was their opening salvo, not their entire clean energy platform, and Clinton herself said in the video that she will lay out her entire platform "over the next few months."

But other 2016 Democrats were quick to pounce on Clinton's proposal.

In a memo titled, "What Real Climate Leadership Looks Like," Lis Smith, Martin O'Malley's deputy campaign manager, stressed that the former Maryland governor outlined his clean energy plan last month and has backed up his plan with "action, not just words."

"Eschewing the piecemeal, poll-tested 'all of the above' energy strategies of the past, O'Malley has made clear that he will use the full force of his executive power to make the transition to a clean energy future the number one priority of our federal government," Smith wrote.

Despite the critics, Clinton's plans was met with warm regard from environmental groups.

Tiernan Sittenfeld, an executive for the League of Conservation Voters Action Fund, called Clinton's video "spot on" and said it proved Clinton "will make it a top priority throughout her campaign."

"This," Sittenfeld sad, "underscores Secretary Clinton's longtime commitment to confronting the climate crisis."

Here is Hillary Clinton’s climate plan // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald - July 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton will roll out a comprehensive climate and energy policy proposal Monday that would dramatically increase the country’s use of renewable energy.

Clinton’s plan, which she will unveil at an energy efficient transit hub in Iowa, will promise to create enough clean renewable energy to power every home in the U.S. within 10 years of Clinton taking office.

That includes a 700% increase in solar panel installation by the end of her hypothetical first term, for a total of half a billion installed solar panels. Clinton will also call for a rapid expansion of power generation capacity from wind, hydro, geothermal, and other renewable sources.

The former secretary of state will also propose incentives for the technological development of solar and other sources through a number of partnerships and competitions. For instance, she would create a “Solar x-prize” for communities that make it easier to install roof-top panels. And she would create new tax incentives and competitive grants to encourage states and the private sector to invest in clean energy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She will also call for improvements to the electrical grid, expanding renewable energy production on public lands and increase federal R&D funding.

“I am setting some really high goals that we are going to meet when I am president,” Clinton said in Ames, Iowa Sunday.

Clinton’s plan would also adopt a proposal known as “Deep Decarbonization Pathways,” an international partnership of high-emitting countries that works to find ways to transition industrial countries to low-carbon economies.

“The decisions we make in the next decade can make all of this possible or they can keep us trapped in the past,” Clinton said in a video posted to her website previewing the plan. “We cannot wait any longer.”

In the video, Clinton also goes after Republicans, listing quotes from top GOP presidential candidates casting doubt on the science of climate change.

Billionaire Clinton donor Tom Steyer, who funds his own climate group and is pushing Democrats to be more aggressive on global warming, called Clinton’s plan an “ambitious framework” and said it made her “a strong leader in solving the climate crisis.”

Democratic rival Martin O’Malley has already rolled out a plan that he promise would transition the country 100% renewable energy, and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders often says climate change is a top priority.

Hillary Clinton Calls Out GOP Climate Change Deniers in New 'Stand With Reality' Video // ABC // Liz Kreutz - July 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton today attacked the Republican presidential contenders who deny "the settled science of climate change" and laid out two renewable power goals in a new video that outlines part of her plan to tackle global warming.

"It's hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change, who would rather remind us they're not scientists than listen to those who are," Clinton narrates over a graphic that shows quotes from Republican presidential candidates, including Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio, and Donald Trump.

"You don't have to be scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all. You just have to be willing to act," she continues.

By contrast, in the video -- titled "Stand with Reality" -- Clinton calls herself "just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain" who knows that "what's happening in the world is going to have a big effect on my daughter and especially on my granddaughter."

Clinton then lays out two national goals that she would implement "on day one as president."

The first pledge: to have more than half a billion solar panels installed across the country by the end of her first term. And the second: to have the U.S. generate enough clean renewable energy to power every home in America within 10 years.

"The decisions we make in the next decade can make all of this possible, or they can keep us trapped in the past," Clinton says. "We cannot wait any longer."

On the campaign trail, Clinton repeatedly calls for a "global fight against climate change," which she says is "one of the defining threats of our time." The video, which was posted to her campaign website Sunday night, however, is the first time the Democratic presidential candidate has laid out specific policy proposals on how she would plan to tackle the issue should she become president.

Hillary Clinton Says Climate Plan Will Promote Renewables // NBC // July 26, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton planned to unveil a plan Sunday aimed at combating climate change that includes revisions in the tax code to promote renewable energy.

In Iowa, the nation's second-leading wind energy producer, Clinton said people are "just not paying attention" if they don't acknowledge climate change.

Clinton said she supported renewing the wind energy tax credit and getting other tax incentives "fixed" to promote renewable fuel.

Though Clinton hinted that under her plan the coal industry would face changes, she said the federal government would help the industry.

Climate change has become a key issue in the Democratic presidential primary, where Clinton is the heavy favorite. Billionaire Tom Steyer has led an effort to promote the issue. Steyer hosted a fundraiser for Clinton in May.

"We can make a transition over time from a fossil fuel economy, predominantly, to a clean renewable energy economy, predominantly," Clinton said later during an event at a central Iowa rural home.

Changes in the tax code aimed at promoting renewable energy and transitioning away from coal is a tricky political position in key places in the country. Southeast Ohio and western Pennsylvania, states that have been pivotal in recent elections, remain the home of key coal-producing areas.

Clinton was making her comments at Iowa State University in Ames and later in Carroll.

Clinton said she planned to post the plan on her campaign website at 7 p.m. EDT, and explain it in more detail during an event Monday in Des Moines.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, also seeking the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, noted Sunday that he unveiled a climate change plan in Iowa. Campaign aides to O'Malley said that as governor, he made climate change a top priority, doubled Maryland's renewable fuel production, and reduced greenhouse gases by 10 percent during his two terms.

Clinton sets goals for solar panels, clean energy // CBS // Rebecca Kaplan and Hannah Fraser-Chanpong – July 27, 2015

Presidential candidate Hillary Clinton announced Sunday that her plans to combat climate change as president include installing more than half a billion solar panels across the U.S. by the end of her first term and generating enough clean renewable energy to power every home in America within 10 years of taking office.

Clinton, the frontrunner for the 2016 Democratic nomination, announced the goals in a video released by her campaign Sunday evening. Her campaign said the two initiatives were part of a comprehensive energy and climate agenda she'll lay out over the next several months.

"Future generations will look back and think 'what were we thinking, how could we possibly be so irresponsible?' " Clinton says as the narrator of a video that features images of children, wildlife, and images associated with energy production. "I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and brain and I know what's happening in the world is going to have a big effect on my daughter and especially on my granddaughter."

The video also takes direct aim at the Republican presidential candidates for statements skeptical of climate change. Clinton speaks, the video shows quotes from candidates including former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush ("I'm a skeptic. I'm not a scientist"), Florida Sen. Marco Rubio ("I'm not a scientist") and Texas Sen. Ted Cruz ("There's been no warming whatsoever") and other candidates.

"It's hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change who would rather remind us they're not scientists than listen to those who are," Clinton says. "You don't have to be a scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all, you just have to be wiling to act."

Clinton argues that increasing the use of wind, solar, hydro, geothermal and other renewable energy will help prevent as many as 3,000 premature deaths and 700,000 asthma attacks each year.

Expanding the installation of solar panels across the U.S. would increase the current capacity to 140 gigawatts by the end of 2020, a 700 percent increase her campaign said. It would be like having rooftop solar systems on 25 million houses across the country.

A fact sheet released by the campaign offered a number of federal government initiatives Clinton would implement to help reach the goals, including partnerships with states, cities and rural communities that are leading on clean energy, competitive grants to states that exceed federal carbon pollution standards, awards for communities that make it easier and cheaper to install rooftop solar systems, strengthening grid reliability and resilience, and making it easier to get low-cost renewable energy to market.

She is also promising to talk about plans to reduce oil consumption in the U.S. and around the world, improve the safety and security of the existing energy infrastructure, make fossil fuel production safer, and protect the health and retirement security of former coal workers and their families.

At an event in Iowa Sunday, Clinton said those who don't acknowledge the existence of climate change are "just not paying attention." Iowa is the second-largest producer of wind-generated electricity in the nation, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration.

Clinton's plan follows one laid out by another Democratic candidate, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, which promises to end the country's reliance on fossil fuels entirely by 2050 and to double American energy efficiency within 15 years. O'Malley promises an entire nation powered by renewable energy within the 35 years, as opposed to Clinton's pledge to power every home with renewable energy in 10 years.

Though Clinton has not revealed the full extent of her policies to address climate change, O'Malley said he would deny permits for drilling off the coasts of Alaska and Antarctic and promises not to build the Keystone XL pipeline. Clinton has not yet said what she would do about the pipeline.

Clinton's biggest challenger for the Democratic nomination, Independent Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, regularly talks about climate change in his stump speech, describing dire weather conditions created by the warming of the planet. He has not yet laid out a formal plan to combat climate change, although last month he introduced legislation which would provide $200 million in loans and grants for solar panels on public housing and low-income family homes.

Hillary Clinton Focuses On Renewable Energy In Climate Change Plan // HuffPo // Marina Fang - July 26, 2015

In an ambitious climate change plan, Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton pledged to make sure every American home is powered by renewable energy by 2027 if elected president and install half a billion solar panels around the country before the end of her first term.

Her campaign released a copy of the plan Sunday evening. Clinton spoke about climate change at two campaign events in Iowa earlier in the day, telling supporters that climate change deniers are “just not paying attention.”

"Those people on the other side, they will answer any question about climate change by saying, 'I’m not a scientist.' Well, I’m not a scientist either. I’m just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain," she said.

Clinton’s proposal also calls for promoting tax credits to incentivize a push toward renewable energy and away from coal.

"We can make a transition over time from a fossil fuel economy, predominantly, to a clean renewable energy economy, predominantly," she said on Sunday.

Clinton plans to address these proposals in more detail at an event on Monday, according to her campaign. The plan is a preview of more specific policy positions that she will announce in the coming months, which will include a Clean Energy Challenge involving competitive grants for states and municipalities to develop and implement renewable energy solutions.

On Sunday evening, environmental groups such as the Sierra Club and the League of Conservation Voters quickly issued statements applauding Clinton's plan.

Climate change activist Tom Steyer endorsed Clinton's plan in a statement, calling her "a strong leader in solving the climate crisis."

“I look forward to other candidates laying out aggressive plans to tackle climate change head-on. It’s time for all leaders to acknowledge the problem our country faces and engage in a robust debate about the best way to tackle climate change and build a clean energy economy," he said.

The billionaire founder of NextGen Climate, who hosted a Clinton fundraiser at his San Francisco home in May, called for all of the presidential candidates to develop concrete plans to increase clean energy usage. Steyer said last Friday that he would not support candidates without such proposals.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley (D), one of Clinton's challengers in the race, unveiled a climate change plan last month. Responding to Clinton, his campaign noted Sunday that as governor of Maryland, he doubled the state's renewable fuel production and reduced greenhouse gas emissions by 10 percent.

O'Malley and fellow Democratic presidential hopeful Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) have also been outspoken against the construction of the Keystone XL pipeline, while Clinton has largely avoided the issue.

Hillary Clinton Pledges to Install 500 Million Solar Panels If Voted President // TIME // Helen Regan - July 26, 2015

"We are on the cusp of a new era"

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton on Sunday made tackling climate change one of her key goals were she to enter the White House, pledging to have more than half a billion solar panels installed nationwide by the end of her first term in office.

Clinton also called for a major increase in other renewable energy sources, saying she wants every U.S. home to be powered by clean energy within a decade, reports Reuters.

"I want more wind, more solar, more advanced biofuels, more energy efficiency," she said at a weekend rally in Iowa. "And I've got to tell you, people who argue against this are just not paying attention."

The two goals were unveiled in a video posted to Clinton's campaign website Sunday, and are part of a comprehensive agenda on climate change that will be laid out over the next few months.

"We are on the cusp of a new era," she said in the campaign video. "We can have more choice in the energy we consume and produce."

According to the former Secretary of State's campaign, her climate change agenda will increase output of solar energy by 700% by the end of the decade.

On Monday, the presidential candidate will explain her clean energy plan in more detail at a tour of an energy-efficient transit station in Des Moines, Iowa.

Hillary Clinton sticks to safe ground on climate // Vox // Jonathan Allen – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton unveiled a proposal to combat climate change last night, and it appears to be in the pragmatic Clintonian space of sticking to safe ground. Rather than trying to outdo her Democratic rivals, Clinton's plan seems designed to allow her to contrast with Republicans who either don't acknowledge the reality of climate change or aren't really ready to do anything about it. As Seema Mehta and Evan Halper of the LA Times report, Clinton says her approach would put the US on a path to have all homes and businesses powered by renewable energy by 2027 — a goal her campaign frames as both light on details and far short of where environmentalists would like her to be.

The Clinton package is incomplete, however. Unlike her rivals in the Democratic presidential contest, Clinton has yet to take a position on the controversial Keystone XL pipeline, which would transport oil from the Canadian tar sands to Gulf Coast ports. She also has yet to weigh in on a campaign to ban hydraulic fracturing nationwide, or to take a firm position on offshore oil drilling.

The proposal Clinton released Sunday for boosting solar installations by 700% is vague on details about how it would be funded.

Clinton continues to enjoy a commanding lead among Democratic primary voters. She seems unconcerned by the more detailed and aggressive proposals offered by challengers within her party.

Vox's Brad Plumer writes that Clinton's goal involves a 700 percent increase in solar power between now and 2020 — and concludes that it's possible to achieve that level.

US solar capacity grew 418 percent between 2010 and 2014 (it was starting from a small base). So 700 percent growth between 2014 and 2020 is at least within the realm of possibility. But it would require additional policy changes — and clean energy prices would have to keep dropping.

Hillary Clinton is calling for a 700% increase in solar power. Is that realistic? // Vox // Brad Plumer - July 26, 2015

In the coming months, Hillary Clinton's campaign is planning to release a series of proposals for dealing with global warming. Her first installment is out Sunday evening, and it calls for a major increase in renewable power.

Specifically, she's proposing to boost the amount of wind, solar, and other renewables so that they provide 33 percent of America's electricity by 2027 — enough to power every home in the country:

Let's put this in perspective. Renewable energy currently supplies just 13 percent of America's electricity, with hydropower providing 6 percent, wind power providing 4.4 percent, and the rest coming from biomass, geothermal, and solar.

Without new policies, the government expects that fraction to rise to 16 percent by 2027. If you add on President Obama's forthcoming Clean Power Plan — an EPA program to reduce carbon-dioxide emissions from power plants — then renewables are projected to grow to 25 percent of US electricity by 2027.

Clinton is proposing to bump that up even further, to 33 percent. One key question is how.

Clinton's plan calls for a 700% increase in solar power

Part of her plan would involve continuing the rapid growth of solar panel installations nationwide. In her proposal, Clinton calls for US solar power to grow 700 percent from current levels:

That sounds like a big number, but it's not implausible. After all, US solar capacity grew 418 percent between

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2010 and 2014, so 700 percent growth by 2027 is at least within the realm of possibility. It would require the right policies in place (and for solar prices to keep dropping).

On that score, Clinton's campaign offered a number of policy proposals for boosting renewables:

-- First, if elected president, Clinton would veto any attempts by Republicans in Congress to scrap Obama's Clean Power Plan. This is mostly a defensive maneuver.

-- Second, she'd push to extend the federal tax credits for wind and solar that are scheduled to expire soon. (The 30 percent tax credit for residential solar systems is set to disappear in 2016.) This is a key step, but it would depend entirely on Congress. It's not something Clinton could ever do on her own. And note many lawmakers would prefer to let these tax credits sunset, so this proposal is hardly guaranteed.

-- Third, Clinton wants to set up a "Clean Energy Challenge" that would gives states and localities incentives to go even further than the carbon standards the EPA is putting out. The campaign says it will offer more details on this in the coming weeks and months. One component? A "Solar X-prize" that would reward communities that figured out how to cut red tape and speed up solar installation times.

-- Clinton also has a smattering of proposals to boost public investment in clean energy R&D, in transmission lines, and in renewable installation on public lands.

-- Finally, Clinton calls for aid to coal communities that will inevitably suffer if coal continues to decline in favor of cleaner energy sources. No details on this yet, but her campaign notes that the government should "provide economic opportunities for those that kept the lights on and factories running for more than a century." (Note that the Obama administration has proposed a $3 billion aid package for coal communities, but few members of Congress seem interested for now.)

How ambitious is Clinton's renewables goal? It depends how you look at it.

If the US actually managed to get 33 percent of its electricity from renewables in 2027 and we kept most of our nuclear plants running (which currently supply another 19 percent), then the country would be getting roughly half its electricity from zero-carbon sources.

That would obviously be a major shift from where we are today. It's also in line with the "50% clean energy by 2030" goal that green activist and billionaire Tom Steyer is demanding candidates get behind.

On the other hand, this isn't, by itself, a comprehensive climate plan. Electricity only accounts for 38 percent of US carbon-dioxide emissions. Other major sources include transportation (i.e., cars, trucks, and planes that burn oil), industrial processes (i.e., cement plants or chemical plants that use coal or gas), homes and buildings that use natural gas for heating, and so on:

So boosting renewable electricity is only one part of the picture here. We'll see what else Clinton ends up proposing.

Could the US electric grid handle that much wind and solar?

This is another big question about Clinton's proposal. As wind and solar expand, US grid operators will face challenges integrating all these intermittent sources of electricity. After all, the sun isn't always blowing and the wind isn't always shining.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is a little hard to answer, just because it would depend on the precise mix of renewables, where the growth in wind and solar occurred, whether utility regulators made certain policy changes, and so forth.

But for context, my colleague David Roberts has written an excellent series on the challenges that wind and solar pose to the grid. Part one looks at the hassles of dealing with intermittent renewables. Part two looks at how solar and wind start to face severe economic limitations past a certain point (and Clinton's stated goals would put wind and solar within striking distance of those levels). And part three looks at potential market reforms that could ease these constraints. Definitely read that series if you haven't already.

Hillary Clinton's Climate-Change Plan Is Anything But Comprehensive // TNR // Rebecca Leber – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton has unveiled a plan for tackling climate change—or, more accurately, part of a plan, with the promise of additional announcements in the coming months. The Democratic presidential frontrunner detailed a plank of her environmental platform on her website Sunday night, for making the United States "the world's clean energy superpower." But on fossil fuels, where environmentalists have remained the most skeptical of her intentions, Clinton's plans remain vague.

Clinton announced two ambitious goals:

"Have more than half a billion solar panels installed across the country by the end of Hillary's first term"—a 700 percent increase in solar capacity that would power 25 million homes.

"Generate enough renewable energy to power every home in America within 10 years of Hillary taking office," which would require expanding renewables (wind, solar, geothermal, and hydropower) enough to power 33 percent of the U.S. electricity sector by 2027, up from just 13 percent today.

Campaign chair John Podesta, a former White House senior adviser on climate change, characterized the plan as historic. "Her proposals provide incentives for businesses and individuals to gain access to renewable energy and lower their monthly bills," he wrote Monday. "It pairs national action with a commitment to provide more resources to the groundswell of states and cities that are taking innovative actions above and beyond federal policies."

The League of Conservation Voters and Democratic billionaire donor Tom Steyer both praised Clinton's announcement, but she hasn't satisfied all environmentalists' demands for a comprehensive climate action plan. Clinton hasn't said where she stands on the Keystone XL pipeline, tar sands oil extraction, natural gas, fracking, and Arctic drilling. Surely, Clinton's position on these areas will be more controversial than her targets for clean energy. Climate Hawks Vote said in a statement that "Clinton's climate plan is remarkable for what it does't say, yet: no effort to keep fossil fuels in the ground, no price on carbon; no word on Keystone XL, Arctic oil, or other carbon bombs; no word on fracking; no call for adaptation."

But by releasing a plan for clean energy, Clinton has achieved two things.

First, it helps to blunt environmentalists' criticism of Clinton for her relative silence on the issue. Former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley has a plan to achieve 100 percent renewable electricity by 2050—what "real climate leadership looks like," his campaign declared in a memo to reporters before Clinton's announcement. Senator Bernie Sanders hasn't announced a climate change plan yet, but has supported bills for rooftop solar, opposes Keystone, and overall has (by at least one count) the best environmental record of any senator.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Second, Clinton has answered Steyer's challenge. On Friday, the green donor set his first expectation for candidates wanting his support in the 2016 election, requiring that they first lay out a plan to reach at least 50 percent renewables in the electricity sector by 2030. The Clinton campaign noted on Twitter that it passed Steyer's test, if you count existing nuclear energy, at 19 percent. Steyer's campaign arm NextGen Climate counts nuclear in its 50 percent tally:

And Steyer is satisfied with Clinton's answer, for now. 'Today, Hillary Clinton emerged as a strong leader in solving the climate crisis and ensuring our country's economic security," he said in a statement. "Clinton laid out an ambitious framework to put our nation on a path to a clean energy economy that will create millions of jobs—and in the coming months we look forward to hearing more details about her proposals to tackle climate change."

But Clinton's climate plan can't ignore more difficult questions on how much to rely on fossil fuels during the transition to cleaner power. As Vox's Brad Plumer notes, electricity accounts for 38 percent of U.S. carbon emissions—transportation, buildings powered by gas, industry, and more make up the rest. There's also methane, a particularly potent emission that is on the rise in agriculture, landfills, and the oil and gas sectors.

Until she rolls out the rest of her climate platform, Clinton's still vulnerable to criticism from progressive environmentalists. Friends of the Earth spokesperson Ben Schreiber said that "while it is great that Secretary Clinton has recognized the importance of renewable energy, the reality is that her plan will not lead to the transformation that we desperately need. If we are going to avoid the worst impacts of climate change we are going to need an Apollo program for renewable energy, not just the corporate stimulus that Secretary Clinton has offered."

Hillary Clinton unveils climate change policy // LA Times // Evan Halper and Seema Mehta – July 27, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton sought to position herself as a crusader against climate change Sunday by unveiling some robust goals, even as she continued to avoid some of the more contentious battles around global warming.

Clinton announced that she will push to vastly expand the number of solar panels installed in the United States, as well as to boost overall renewable energy to the point that it will be able to fuel all homes and businesses by 2027.

The proposals reflect Clinton's commitment to continuing the path on climate change set by President Obama, who champions numerous policies that bolster renewables and push a reduction in fossil fuel consumption.

The Clinton package is incomplete, however. Unlike her rivals in the Democratic presidential contest, Clinton has yet to take a position on the controversial Keystone XL pipeline, which would transport oil from the Canadian tar sands to Gulf Coast ports. She also has yet to weigh in on a campaign to ban hydraulic fracturing nationwide, or to take a firm position on offshore oil drilling.

The proposal Clinton released Sunday for boosting solar installations by 700% is vague on details about how it would be funded.

Clinton continues to enjoy a commanding lead among Democratic primary voters. She seems unconcerned by the more detailed and aggressive proposals offered by challengers within her party.

Clinton's plan, which campaign officials said is just the first part of a larger platform that will be rolled out gradually, appeared to be aimed squarely at distinguishing her from Republicans.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a campaign video detailing her plan, Clinton said, “It’s hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change, who would rather remind us they’re not scientists than listen to those who are.”

As Clinton speaks in the video, quotes from GOP candidates expressing skepticism that global warming is a real threat appear on the screen. Climate change has proved a challenging issue for Republican politicians, many of whom are critical of energy policies aimed at curbing it.

Polls show that most voters believe climate change is a real threat and they want action taken. But voters also rarely cite it as their top concern.

Hillary Clinton draws contrast with Republicans as she lays out economic plan

Hillary Clinton draws contrast with Republicans as she lays out economic plan

Regardless, the issue works well for Clinton as she campaigns in Iowa, a leader in wind production. The industry's rapid expansion here has been made possible in large part because of federal tax credits.

At a rally before about 400 people in Ames, Clinton cited the wind turbines sprouting on farms across the state.

She voiced her support for continuing the wind production credit, saying the nation’s tax code is weighted too heavily in favor of fossil fuels rather than renewable energy.

Continuation of such incentives is cited in the brief fact sheet the Clinton campaign distributed Sunday night. It also included programs to award states that are the most aggressive on renewable energy with more federal funding, a reduction in red tape that inhibits the expansion of solar energy and policy changes that would make solar power affordable for low-income households.

At the center of this part of Clinton’s energy agenda is a policy recently implemented by Obama. Clinton vows to be a protector of the Clean Power Plan, which puts strict limits on the amount of greenhouse gases power plants can release. Several states have gone to court seeking to block enforcement of the new rules.

Clinton also praised coal miners’ contributions to economic growth, a tacit acknowledgment that the shift toward clean energy is viewed skeptically by communities reliant on coal for their livelihoods. Many of those areas, including in battleground states like Ohio, are home to conservative white Democrats crucial to Clinton's White House hopes.

“It’s important that we help them transition to a new economy,” she said. “I want to do more to help people in coal country and other parts of our nation that are not enjoying the kind of growth and development and prosperity we’re seeing in a place like Story County,” where the rally was taking place.

Some environmentalists are uneasy with Clinton’s approach so far to climate change. They would like to have seen her work as secretary of State to scuttle the Keystone project. Her relationships with donors and advisors connected to large fossil fuel companies make them anxious. And her support during her 2008 presidential run for “clean coal” as a viable, green alternative has not been forgotten.

At a town hall event in New Hampshire this month, an activist with 350.org pushed her to commit to banning fossil fuel extraction on public land. Clinton declined to do so, saying such energy production is necessary to keep the economy moving until there are enough alternatives in place.

Hillary Clinton Refuses to Take a Position on the Keystone Pipeline // Mother Jones // Tim McDonnell – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton took a strong stance on clean energy Monday, telling a crowd in Des Moines, Iowa, that her efforts to tackle climate change would parallel President John F. Kennedy's call to action during the space race in the 1960s.

"I want to get the country back to setting big ambitious goals," Clinton said. "I want us to get back into the future business, and one of the best ways we can do that is to be absolutely ready to address the challenge of climate change and make it work to our advantage economically."

Her remarks tracked closely with an ambitious plan her campaign released Sunday night, which set a target of producing enough renewable energy to power all the nation's homes and businesses by 2027.

"America's ability to lead the world on this issue hinges on our ability to act ourselves," she said. "I refuse to turn my back on what is one of the greatest threats and greatest opportunities America faces."

"I think it's bogus," said Bill McKibben. "The more she tries to duck the question, the more the whole thing smells."

Still, the Democractic front-runner refused—as she has several times before—to say whether or not she supports construction of the Keystone XL pipeline. That project, which would carry crude oil from Canada's tar sands to refineries and ports in the United States, is seen by many environmentalists as a blemish on President Barack Obama's climate record. It has been stalled for years in a lengthy State Department review that began when Clinton was still Secretary of State. The Obama administration has resisted several recent attempts by Congress to force Keystone's approval, but it has yet to make a final decision on the project—although one is expected sometime this year.

"I will refrain from commenting [on Keystone XL], because I had a leading role in getting that process started, and we have to let it run its course," Clinton said, in response to a question from an audience member.

Her non-position on Keystone earned derision from environmentalist Bill McKibben, whose organization 350.org has been at the forefront of opposition to the pipeline.

"I think it's bogus," he said in an email. "Look, the notion that she can't talk about it because the State Dept. is still working on it makes no sense. By that test, she shouldn't be talking about Benghazi or Iran or anything else either. The more she tries to duck the question, the more the whole thing smells."

Clinton also punted on an audience request to reveal further details of how exactly she would finance the renewable energy targets she announced yesterday, which aim even higher than those already put in place by Obama. She reiterated that one key step would be to ensure the extension of federal tax credits for wind and solar energy that have expired or are set to expire over the next few years. And she said that she would continue Obama's practice of pursuing aggressive climate policies from within the White House, saying that "we still have a lot we can do" without waiting for a recalcitrant Congress to act.

Clinton acknowledged that the clean energy boom would come at a cost for the US coal industry, which is already in steep decline. She said she would "guarantee that coal miners and their families get the benefits they've earned," but didn't elaborate on what she meant or how specifically she would achieve that.

Environmental groups offered a generally positive reaction to Clinton's policy announcement Sunday. In a statement, League of Conservation Voters vice president Tiernan Sittenfield commended her for "calling out climate change deniers and effectively illustrating the urgent need to act on a defining issue of our time." She also earned praise from billionaire environmentalist Tom Steyer, who has set a high bar on climate action for any candidate who wants to tap his millions.

"I refuse to let those who are deniers to rip away all the progress we've made and leave our country exposed to climate change," Clinton said.

Hillary Clinton Just Went Big on Clean Energy. That Was the Easy Part. // Slate // Josh Voorhees – July 27, 2015

At long last, Hillary Clinton has finally given the climate crowd something to get excited about. On Sunday the Democratic hopeful unveiled the first specific plank of what she is promising will be a comprehensive plan to address global warming. Clinton's bold-faced goals are something to behold: Installing more than half a billion solar panels in the United States by the end of her first term, and generating enough clean energy to power every home in the country within a decade of taking office.

Her energy proposal won't be enough to completely win over climate hawks, who have been skeptical of her environmental bona fides—but it's a solid start. Climate activists have long demanded that the next president go further than President Obama, and Clinton's proposal would do just that. In addition to protecting the historic climate rules being implemented by Obama's Environmental Protection Agency, Clinton is pledging to boost solar, wind, and other renewables to the point where they provide 33 percent of the country's electricity by 2027. Obama, meanwhile, has put the country on the path to reach about 25 percent by that same year.

Exactly how Clinton would get us to her goal remains unclear. But the broad brushstrokes suggest she'd rely heavily on tax incentives to spur the growth of renewables—particularly solar, which she says would see a 700 percent increase in U.S. capacity under her plan. At the center of her proposal is what her campaign has dubbed the Clean Energy Challenge, which would include: grants and "other market-based incentives" to encourage states to go above and beyond the actions required by federal law; a boost to federal investment in clean energy R&D; and an expansion of renewable production on public lands. She's also expected to push to extend current federal tax credits for solar and wind that are set to expire soon. Clinton's campaign pegs the estimated cost of the entire plan at about $60 billion over 10 years, which would be offset by eliminating tax breaks for the oil and gas industry.

"We need to get the incentives fixed in our tax system, which as you know are too heavily weighted toward fossil fuels," Clinton said Sunday while campaigning in central Iowa ahead of her more formal climate rollout on Monday in Des Moines.

My colleague Eric Holthaus will have much more on the policy specifics and how they stack up against the plans already put forth by Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley in a bit. But on the strictly political side of the equation, it's clear that Clinton's proposal is clever. She's telling Americans what she'll add—rooftop solar for more than 25 million homes!—without having to address the more politically fraught conversation of what she's willing to subtract. Notably missing from the policy rollout was any mention of blocking Keystone XL, the controversial pipeline that has become a high-profile litmus test for the climate crowd, or a pledge to curb fossil fuel extraction on public lands.

Clinton's got a ways to go before fully captivating the climate hawks. The four-page fact sheet released by her campaign offered only vague promises that her climate policy planks will ensure "that fossil fuel production taking place today is safe and responsible, that taxpayers get a fair deal for development on public lands, and that areas that are too sensitive for energy production are taken off the table." Until Clinton fills in the blanks on just what is "safe and responsible" and what isn't, the issue will remain a red flag for Team Green, particularly given Clinton's previous comments suggesting a much more moderate, let's-not-move-too-fast approach to issues of drilling and mining. "Hillary Clinton is half the way there," climate activist Bill McKibben said in a statement Monday that made it clear he and his allies will be watching for Clinton to weigh in on offshore drilling in the Arctic and coal mining in the Powder River Basin.

For now, though, Clinton has seized some much-needed momentum on an issue she's had problems with in the past. Not incidentally: Her clean energy proposal appears to pass the clean energy litmus test unveiled late last week by Tom Steyer, the billionaire environmentalist who is expected to spend tens of millions of dollars through his super PAC in the 2016 election.

Hillary Clinton has big plans for solar power. Are they achievable? // CS Monitor // David J. Unger – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton sees your plans for a clean-energy future and raises you a few hundred-million solar panels.

The Democratic presidential frontrunner rolled out an ambitious plan late Sunday to decarbonize the US power sector, the first of what her campaign says will be a series of energy and climate policy announcements.

Although light on details, Mrs. Clinton's plan sets high targets for renewable energy deployment and goes further than energy policies put in place by President Obama – the first occupant of the Oval Office to take direct executive action on climate change. The plan is an attempt to fend off critics from the left who say the former secretary of state has been slow make climate a part of her campaign. It also puts Clinton in stark contrast to Republican candidates, the majority of whom either avoid discussing mainstream climate science or dismiss it outright.

"I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain, and I know what's happening in the world is going to have a big effect on my daughter, and especially on my granddaughter," Clinton says in a video unveiling the climate plan. "It's hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change – who would rather remind us 'they're not scientists' than listen to those who are."

The US will install more than a billion solar panels by 2020, according to Clinton's plan, raising total installed capacity from today's 21 gigawatts to 140 gigawatts. That represents a 700 percent increase over four years. As Vox's Brad Plumer points out, that's a big number, but not entirely implausible. Between 2010 and 2014, solar capacity grew by 418 percent, according to the US Energy Information Administration.

The plan also calls for the US to generate enough renewables to power every US home by 2027. That equates roughly to generating a third of US electricity from wind, solar, and other renewable sources – up from 13 percent today. It also goes beyond the 25 percent of electricity generation from renewables that is projected to come with President Obama's proposed Clean Power Plan. That plan, which would regulate carbon emissions from US power plants for the first time in the nation's history, is being challenged in Congress and in court. If elected president, Clinton says she will defend the plan from its critics.

"The Clean Power Plan is a crucial tool in our national strategy to reduce carbon pollution, level the playing field for and increase the deployment of renewable energy, and build a clean energy future," the campaign's fact sheet reads. "But smart federal standards set the floor, not the ceiling. We can and must go further."

investor and climate activist Tom Steyer has urged presidential candidates to adopt a target of generating half of US power from carbon-free sources by 2030. Clinton's plan would bring her platform in line with that target or potentially exceed it, assuming nuclear generation remains flat or even grows.

The plan is expected to cost around $60 billion, according to a campaign spokesman, to be offset by eliminating tax breaks for the oil and gas industry.

The question, then, is whether or not Clinton's vision is both technically feasible and politically viable. Most analysts suggest that a significant decarbonization of US energy supply over the coming decades would be challenging, but certainly within the realm of possibility. The technology for carbon-free power generation already exists – it's a matter of deploying those technologies and ensuring they work in harmony to create a stable grid.

Indeed, "it is technically feasible to achieve an 80% greenhouse gas reduction below 1990 levels by 2050 in the United States," according to a joint study released last fall by the consultancy Energy and Environmental Economics, Lawrence Berkeley National Lab, and Pacific Northwest National Laboratory. The study outlines several different pathways to meet that target that rely on different generation mixes and estimates the incremental cost of such an endeavor to be less than 1 percent of US GDP.

It's harder to say whether or not such a plan is politically viable. Cap-and-trade bills that would put a price on carbon have been largely a non-starter in Congress, and executive actions are vulnerable to legal and Congressional challenges. But there are some signs that public support for climate policies is growing, which could shift how presidential candidates view the issue. Forty-six percent of Americans say that global warming is a serious problem, according to a June survey by Pew Research Center. That's an increase of 13 percentage points from spring of 2013.

Here's How Hillary Clinton Wants to Fight Global Warming // National Journal // Ben Beman and Clare Foran - July 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton began the closely watched rollout of her energy-and-climate platform Sunday evening by announcing goals that would greatly expand the deployment of renewable power in the coming years.

However, the announcement does not address a suite of controversial topics, including whether Clinton supports the Keystone XL pipeline and whether she would allow oil drilling in Arctic waters.

But the Clinton campaign emphasized that Sunday's proposal is just part of a broader climate-and-energy agenda that will unfold in the coming months.

Clinton's plan calls for more than half a billion solar panels installed across the country by the end of her first term, and having the U.S. generate enough renewable energy to power every home within a decade of the start of a Clinton presidency.

Achieving the goals would mean expanding the amount of installed solar-energy generating capacity by 700 percent from current levels by the end of 2020, and adding more green-power generation capacity to the electric grid than any other decade in U.S. history, according to a summary of the plan.

According to the Clinton campaign, the clean energy agenda outlined on Sunday would meet the test that environmental mega donor Tom Steyer laid out last week when he called on all candidates to put forward a plan to ramp up renewable and carbon-free energy so that it accounts for more than half of all power generation by 2030.

Brian Fallon, a Clinton campaign spokesman, said on Twitter: "Clinton's goal translates to 33% of electricity by 2027. Counting nuclear, as Steyer does, she exceeds his 50% goal."

Steyer was quick to praise Clinton while making clear that he hopes to see the 2016 Democratic frontrunner outline additional actions she will take to fight global warming.

"Today, Hillary Clinton emerged as a strong leader in solving the climate crisis," Steyer said in a statement, adding: "we look forward to hearing more details about her proposals to tackle climate change."

The campaign unveiled the clean-energy pledge by releasing a video and outline of the plan Sunday evening.

"Future generations will look back and wonder: What were we thinking? How could we possibly be so irresponsible?" Clinton's voice intones during the video. "I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain, and I know what's happening in the world is going to have a big effect on my daughter and especially on my granddaughter."

"You don't have to be a scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all; you just have to be willing to act," Clinton adds.

Sunday's rollout is a pivotal political moment in Clinton's relationship to environmentalists, including the more-progressive wing of the movement that has questioned her green bona fides.

Some environmentalists are dubious about Clinton's commitment to powerfully confronting global warming and fossil fuels. The more lefty and aggressive sectors of the green movement, such as Vermont activist Bill McKibben, note her lack of a Keystone position.

And Clinton has applauded the economic benefits of the nation's fracking-fueled oil and natural-gas boom, and the lower carbon emissions of gas compared to coal, while calling for "smart" regulations.

The summary of her plan does not touch on where she may seek to allow or bar development, promising only future information on the topic.

There will be a major initiative, the campaign said, on ways to "ensure that fossil fuel production taking place today is safe and responsible, that taxpayers get a fair deal for development on public lands, and that areas that are too sensitive for energy production are taken off the table."

Steps to achieve the renewable power goals announced on Sunday include protecting the Obama administration's carbon-emissions standards for power plants, according to the Clinton campaign, as well as new initiatives. That means, a "new partnership with states, cities, and rural communities that are ready to lead on clean energy." This work would include grants and "market-based" incentives to help states cut carbon beyond the standards Obama is imposing and accelerate green-energy deployment.

The campaign says Clinton, if elected, would pursue a wide-ranging set of initiatives to expand deployment of renewable energy, such as removing barriers to transmission and fighting to extend green energy tax credits on Capitol Hill, and expanding renewables development on federal lands and buildings, among other steps.

Clinton's campaign chairman, John Podesta, has vowed that Clinton would make climate change and clean energy major themes of her race for the White House.

Subsequent announcements will address issues such as reducing oil consumption in the U.S. and around the world, guarding against supply disruptions, and modernizing energy infrastructure, the campaign said.

On the heels of Sunday night's announcement, Clinton will tour and give a speech on energy and climate Monday at the Des Moines Area Regional Transit Central Station, which has a "platinum" certification in the U.S. Green Building Council's rating system.

Two other contenders for the Democratic nod are appealing to progressive voters with aggressive climate proposals and records of their own.

Sen. Bernie Sanders, who has been gaining in the polls and attracting large crowds, has sponsored legislation to impose a tax on carbon emissions.

Sanders also is a longtime opponent of the Keystone XL pipeline and has endorsed the movement among some universities, churches, foundations, and other institutional investors to dump their holdings in coal and oil-and-gas companies.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, another Keystone foe, unveiled a broad plan in June. It proposes a mandate to require that all of the nation's electricity come from renewable sources by 2050, while expanding EPA's carbon emissions rules for power plants to cover other large pollution sources and rejecting any expansion of offshore drilling, among other measures.

O'Malley, saddled with very low polling numbers, sought to promote his plan ahead of Clinton's announcement Sunday.

"Eschewing the piecemeal, poll-tested, 'all of the above' energy strategies of the past, O'Malley has made clear that he will use the full force of his executive power to make the transition to a clean energy future the Number 1 priority of our federal government," his campaign said.

Clinton, in her Senate career before becoming secretary of State, drew high marks from the League of Conservation Voters, which carefully tracks lawmakers' votes on a suite of environmental and energy matters.

She scored an 82 percent record for her career, though her numbers were dragged down somewhat by missing a number of votes while running for president eight years ago.

Hillary Clinton outlines climate change plan // Washington Examiner // Zack Colman – July 17, 2015

Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton laid out a climate plan Sunday that aim to get half of all electricity generated in the United States from zero-carbon sources within 10 years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Under the plan, Clinton said one-third of power a decade after taking the White House — were she to win the presidency — would come from renewable sources, enough to power every U.S. home. Once combined with existing nuclear power, which doesn't emit carbon, more than half of the nation's electricity would come from zero-emitting sources.

The strategy comes on the heels of pressure from Democratic rivals seeking the White House bid who have darted to the ex-secretary of state's left on climate change. It also comes after billionaire climate activist Tom Steyer prodded candidates Friday to offer detailed plans to get at least half of the nation's power from energy sources that don't emit greenhouse gases.

Shooting for that 50 percent mark underscores the Steyer's rising profile in the Democratic politics along with how central climate change has become for the party as a potential wedge issue with Republicans — only one GOP candidate so far has endorsed scientists' findings that humans are largely the cause of a warming planet.

"Today, Hillary Clinton emerged as a strong leader in solving the climate crisis and ensuring our country's economic security. Clinton laid out an ambitious framework to put our nation on a path to a clean energy economy that will create millions of jobs — and in the coming months we look forward to hearing more details about her proposals to tackle climate change," Steyer said in a statement through his super PAC, NextGen Climate Action.

Steyer already has hosted a fundraiser for Clinton. He hasn't yet said publicly how much he wants to spend in 2016, though it's expected to surpass the $57 million Steyer spent on the 2014 election. Meanwhile, Sen. Bernie Sanders, I-Vt., and ex-Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley have competed for a slice of the liberal environmental base that was a key voting bloc for President Obama in part by touting climate and energy policies sought by the Democratic Party's progressive wing.

Progressives have continued to press Clinton for more details about her climate strategy and have been wary of her credentials, citing her resistance to comment on whether she'd OK the Keystone XL oil sands pipeline. Clinton has said she doesn't think it would be proper to comment on the Canada-to-Texas project because she presided over its application while at Foggy Bottom.

Clinton's team said she would "make it a top priority to fight efforts to roll back the Clean Power Plan," the signature Obama administration climate regulation that's due to be finalized this summer. A growing number of states have signaled they won't comply with the regulation, which seeks to limit carbon emissions from power plants, and it's been in congressional Republican crosshairs for months.

The Clinton campaign also said it would prioritize investment in electric transmission infrastructure, push to extend clean energy tax credits while making them "more cost effective," and try to link up half a billion homes with solar power by the end of a prospective first term, increasing total solar capacity by 700 percent, up to 140 gigawatts.

The strategy also calls for increasing renewable energy production on federal land and expanding clean energy investment in rural communities.

Clinton also looked to shore up support from the Democratic Party's centrists by saying any climate push should include a plan for ensuring coal communities don't fall by the wayside — a plan for which the campaign said would come at a later date. Much of the opposition to Obama's climate agenda comes from coal-heavy states, as they say regulations will put people out of business.

Other parts of Clinton's energy platform will be coming in the ensuing month, her team said. Plans for updating energy infrastructure, reducing global oil consumption and for pursuing "safe and responsible production" of fossil fuels are on the docket.

Hillary Clinton talks big on climate change but silent on Keystone XL // Washington Times // S.A. Miller – July 27, 2015

Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton's move to cozy up to the party's environmentalists came up short Monday when she again refused to take a position on the proposed Keystone XL oil pipeline.

Mrs. Clinton said that she couldn't offer an opinion because she helped establish the approval process for the controversial cross-country pipeline when she was President Obama's secretary of state.

"No other presidential candidate was secretary of state when this process started, and I put together a very thorough, deliberative, evidence-based process to evaluate the environmental impact and other considerations of Keystone," Mrs. Clinton said at an event in Des Moines, Iowa, where she outlined her plan to fight climate change.

"I will refrain from commenting, because I had a leading role in getting that process started, and I think that we have to let it run its course," she said.

U.S. approval of the pipeline has been stymied since Mr. Obama took office.

Environmentalists fiercely oppose the Keystone XL pipeline, which would run from Canada to Nebraska and hook up with existing pipelines to the Gulf Coast, and have made opposition to it a litmus test for Democratic presidential candidates.

Mrs. Clinton had already come under fire for rolling out a climate change agenda that featured ambitious goals to "decarbonize" America but lacked details about how she would accomplish it.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who is waging a long-shot bid for Democratic presidential nomination, pounced on Mrs. Clinton.

"Governor O'Malley is opposed to the Keystone XL pipeline because we can't move to a clean energy future if we continue to rely on dirty, short-term fossil fuel fixes," said O'Malley campaign manager Lis Smith. "Real leadership is about forging public opinion on issues like Keystone — not following it. Every Democrat should follow his lead and take a stand to commit to ending our reliance on fossil fuels."

Hillary Clinton's climate change goals include plan to 'decarbonize' America // Washington Times // S.A. Miller - July 26, 2015

Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton entered the climate change debate Sunday, setting ambitious goals to "decarbonize" America and blasting her Republican rivals for ignoring scientists who warn of a looming disaster from global warming.

Mrs. Clinton announced what she described as the first pillars of a comprehensive energy and climate agenda with a three-minute Web video that presented a montage of scenes of children on playgrounds, farmland and windmills juxtaposed with footage of wildfires, a blazing sun and flood damage.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I’m just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain, and I know what’s happening in the world is going to have a big effect on my daughter and especially on my granddaughter,” Mrs. Clinton said in her narration for the video.

Mrs. Clinton promised that, if elected president, she would set two goals to fight climate change: increase the number of solar panels by more than 500 million across the country by the end of her first term and set a 10-year goal of generating enough renewable energy to power every single home in America.

Mrs. Clinton’s goals served as her opening bid to satisfy the Democratic Party’s liberal base, which wants a more aggressive effort on climate change and environmentalism than President Obama has been able to muster.

Mrs. Clinton’s liberal opponents for the nomination, most significantly Sen. Bernard Sanders of Vermont, already have staked out tough stances and made the issue a centerpiece of their campaigns.

The campaign manager for Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley responded with a memorandum that did not name Mrs. Clinton but highlighted the former Maryland governor’s long-standing plan to combat climate change and make the country 100 percent powered by renewable energy by 2050.

The memo stressed that the climate change issue needed “actions, not just words,” and referenced Mr. O'Malley’s longtime opposition to the Keystone XL cross-country oil pipeline, which is the bane of environmentalists. Mrs. Clinton has not taken a public stand on the pipeline.

Mr. O'Malley has forcefully challenged Mrs. Clinton from the left on a host of issues but has failed to gain traction in the polls, slipping further into the single digits as Mr. Sanders, a self-identified socialist, has gained steam with his own agenda.

The Clinton campaign said the former first lady, senator and secretary of state would discuss more of her plan to increase renewable energy sources and address climate change Monday after a tour at the green-energy certified Des Moines Area Regional Transit (DART) Central Station in Iowa.

To achieve her goals on climate change, Mrs. Clinton would launch a “clean energy challenge” that forms a partnership with states, cities and rural communities that are ready to lead on clean energy, according to the campaign.

The challenge will include:

• Competitive grants and other market-based incentives to empower states to enact carbon pollution standards tougher than the federal government’s and accelerate clean energy deployment.

• Awards for communities that successfully cut the red tape that slows rooftop solar installation times and increases costs for businesses and consumers.

• Work with states, cities and rural communities to strengthen grid reliability and resilience, increase consumer choice and improve customer value.

• Expand the Rural Utilities Service and other successful USDA programs to help provide clean, reliable, and affordable energy, not just to rural Americans but to the rest of the country as well.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The campaign said Mrs. Clinton also would fight efforts to roll back the Clean Power Plan, a proposed rule by the Environmental Protection Agency that would cut carbon emissions from power plants and is being challenged in court.

In the video, Mrs. Clinton called out eight Republican presidential candidates for either denying climate change or claiming they couldn't judge whether climate change exists because they are not scientists.

The screen was filled with the text of quotes from former Sen. Rick Santorum, Sen. Rand Paul, Sen. Marco Rubio, real estate mogul Donald Trump, former Gov. Jeb Bush, former Gov. Rick Perry, Sen. Ted Cruz and Gov. John Kasich.

"It's hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change. Who would rather remind us they're not scientists than listen to those who are," Mrs. Clinton said. "You don't have to be a scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all; you just have to be willing to act."

Mrs. Clinton said Republicans were stuck in the past and she was offering leadership for the future and the opportunity to make America a "clean energy superpower," which is a phrase she has used repeatedly on the campaign trail.

"We're on the cusp of a new era. We can have more choice in the energy we consume and produce. We can create a more open, efficient and resilient grid that connects us, empowers us — improves our health and benefits us all," she said in the video. "The decisions we make in the next decade can make all of this possible, or they can keep us trapped in the past. We cannot wait any longer. It's time we stand for a healthier climate, stand for cleaner air, for science, innovation, for our children, for reality, for the future."

Hillary Clinton Just Released Her First Major Climate Change Proposals // Mic // Zeeshan Aleem – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton has released the first two major policy proposals for her vision for tackling climate change and ensuring the United States' primacy as the "world's clean energy superpower."

The plan, which she announced through a video released on Sunday, sets forth two enterprising goals. Her first commitment is a pledge to have more than half a billion solar panels installed across the country by the end of her first term in office. Her second objective is to power every home in the U.S. with clean renewable energy within a decade of her arrival in the White House.

The Clinton campaign also outlines her plan to form a "Clean Energy Challenge" that would create a network of partnerships between the federal government and states, cities and smaller communities to incentivize investment in renewable energy with grants.

The proposals are only the first of a number of climate policy commitments expected to emerge from Clinton's campaign in the coming months, but already some progressive outfits have responded with cautious optimism to her opening rhetoric.

The plan: Clinton's solar panel agenda would boost the amount of installed solar capacity by 700% by 2020 — the same as "rooftop solar systems on over 25 million homes," according to the campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Her commitment to increasing the amount of renewable energy in the U.S. would double the share of renewables in overall power generation. Currently, renewable energy accounts for about 16% of total power generation in the country; Clinton's 10-year plan would increase that to 33% by 2027. Clinton's camp points out that that's eight percentage points higher than called for under the Obama administration's forthcoming "Clean Power Plan."

In her video announcing the proposals, Clinton takes aim at Republicans who deny climate change and singles out Jeb Bush's comment saying "I'm not a scientist" before describing himself a "skeptic" of global warming.

"It's hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change — who would rather remind us they're not scientists than listen to those who are," Clinton says in the video. "You don't have to be a scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all, you just have to be willing to act."

The reaction: Clinton's message was received fairly well by a number of players in the climate policy field.

Tom Steyer, the head of NextGen Climate, offered vague but warm encouragement on Clinton's ideas in a statement issued by the Clinton campaign: "Today, Hillary Clinton emerged as a strong leader in solving the climate crisis and ensuring our country's economic security. Clinton laid out an ambitious framework to put our nation on a path to a clean energy economy that will create millions of jobs."

Steyer's opinion carries weight for Democratic candidates: His support is accompanied by vast amounts of cash. Steyer is a former hedge fund manager and was the single biggest public spender in the 2014 elections. According to the New York Times, in order to win the backing of his super PAC, a candidate "must pledge to enact an energy policy that would lead to the generation of half the nation's electricity from renewable or zero-carbon sources by 2030... and 100% from clean sources by 2050." When combined with nuclear energy, Clinton's 10-year plan for growing renewable energy more than meets Steyer's 2030 benchmark, as Clinton press secretary Brian Fallon pointed out on Twitter:

Some other climate policy groups praised Clinton's stance on renewable energy, but emphasized that she has yet to prove her mettle on combating fossil fuels.

"Clinton is half the way there — this is a credible commitment to renewable energy, and a recognition that the economics of electricity are changing fast," 350.org co-founder and climate change activist Bill McKibben said in a statement emailed to Mic. "Now, we need Clinton to show she understands the other half of the climate change equation — and prove she has the courage to stand up against fossil fuel projects like offshore and Arctic drilling, coal leasing in the Powder River basin, and the Keystone XL pipeline. Because at the end of the day, growth in renewables doesn't mean enough if we're simultaneously kicking the decarbonization can down the road with more pipelines and more extraction on public lands."

In the past, Clinton has angered green activists with her work on a variety of climate-related issues. But this time around, it seems like her campaign is off to a decent start on the issue.

In climate change plan, Hillary Clinton makes big bet on solar power // Mashable // Andrew Freedman – July 27, 2015

In a speech in Iowa on Monday, Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton began laying out what she says will be a forward-thinking, "ambitious" set of policy proposals and goals to address the threat of manmade global warming.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She does so as she faces a primary challenge from Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont and former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley, who both have progressive records on global warming.

Clinton declared two goals, both of which involve a significant ramp up of renewable energy use in the U.S. The first goal is for the country to have "more than half a billion solar panels" installed in the U.S. by the end of Clinton's first term in office, which would be in 2020.

The second goal also centers on solar power, which has been expanding rapidly in recent years as the cost of manufacturing and installing solar panels has plummeted.

Clinton said she wants the U.S. to generate enough renewable electricity to power every single home in the country within a decade.

These goals, which were first announced on Clinton's campaign website on Sunday night, would involve a 700% increase in installed solar capacity, which is equal to having rooftop solar systems on more than 25 million homes, the Clinton campaign stated in a fact sheet.

The policy proposals, the campaign stated, would put the country on a "deep emission reduction" pathway by the year 2050.

“The reality of climate change is unforgiving no matter what the deniers say,” Clinton said during an appearance at an environmentally-friendly transit station in Des Moines.

Since declaring their candidacy, none of the Republican presidential candidates have voiced support for the scientific consensus on climate change, which is that the world's climate is warming mainly due to manmade emissions of greenhouse gases. Scientists say that this year, in fact, is likely to be the warmest on record.

Clinton pledged to defend President Obama's EPA climate regulations, known as the Clean Power Plan, which is the central component of the current administration's goal of cutting global warming pollutants, such as carbon dioxide, to 26 to 28% below 2005 levels by 2025.

That regulations are under attack in the courts and on Capitol Hill.

“I will defend President Obama’s Clean Power Plan,” she said. “I refuse to let those who are deniers … to rip away all that we’ve managed to do,” she said.

Clinton also said she would reduce economic incentives, such as tax breaks, for oil production and "extend incentives instead for clean energy."

As secretary of state, Clinton helped lead America's climate negotiations at the Copenhagen Summit in 2009, which failed to produce an ambitious agreement that contained binding emissions reductions worldwide. Many climate activists considered that summit to be a bitter disappointment.

Still, Clinton touts the non-binding Copenhagen Accord as a diplomatic accomplishment on her website.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Accord, which was the first time that developing nations such as China agreed to take action to reduce their emissions, paved the way for a new climate treaty to be negotiated in Paris this year.

Clinton's record at those climate talks may come back to haunt the U.S. in Paris, however.

In Copenhagen, it was Clinton who rolled out a $100 billion per year Green Climate Fund to help fund emissions reduction efforts and climate adaptation work in developing countries.

That fund has not yet been fully capitalized, however, and this is a major sticking point as the international community approaches the next crucial round of U.N. climate talks, set for Paris in early December. Many developing countries say that without a working Green Climate Fund, they cannot take potentially painful emissions cuts at home.

In Iowa on Monday, Clinton said the U.S. must lead by example in order to secure climate agreements with other nations. “No country will fall in line just because we tell them to,” she said.

“America needs to lead this fight, not go M.I.A.,” Clinton said.

Clinton has earned the backing of billionaire Tom Steyer, whose group, NextGen Climate Action and a related political action committee, supports candidates who seek to address global warming. Steyer sent an email to reporters lauding Clinton's proposal on Sunday night.

"Today, Hillary Clinton emerged as a strong leader in solving the climate crisis and ensuring our country’s economic security," Steyer said in a statement. "Clinton laid out an ambitious framework to put our nation on a path to a clean energy economy that will create millions of jobs — and in the coming months we look forward to hearing more details about her proposals to tackle climate change."

Clinton dodges Keystone question

On the question of whether or not to approve the Keystone-XL Pipeline from Canada to the U.S., however, Clinton refused to take a position when asked about her stance by a reporter on Monday.

The pipeline would move oil from Canada's oil sands region in Alberta south to refineries along the Gulf Coast, where it would be prepared for export.

In dodging the Keystone issue, Clinton cited her involvement in the review process for the pipeline during her time at the State Department. Secretary of State John Kerry and President Obama have yet to make a decision on whether to approve the pipeline, which falls under the State Department's purview since it would cross an international border.

Clinton said she is confident that “The pipeline’s impacts on global greenhouse gas emissions will be a major factor in that decision."

Bill McKibben, the founder of the environmental group 350.org , lauded Clinton's policy proposals on Monday, but criticized her position on Keystone.

"Now, we need Clinton to show she understands the other half of the climate change equation — and prove she has the courage to stand up against fossil fuel projects like offshore and Arctic drilling, coal leasing in the Powder River basin, and the Keystone XL pipeline," he said in a statement.

"... At the end of the day, growth in renewables doesn't mean enough if we're simultaneously kicking the decarbonization can down the road with more pipelines and more extraction on public lands," McKibben said.

Hillary Clinton's Climate Change Video Finally Calls Out Republicans' Bogus "I'm Not A Scientist" Platform // Bustle // Lauren Barbato – July 27, 2015

For the next leg of her campaign, Hillary Clinton is taking on climate change. In a video released by her campaign Sunday night, Clinton unveiled her official climate-change position, as well as the policies she intends to put in place if she reaches the White House. So, what is her position on this major 2016 talking point? Well, let's just say Clinton's stance on the validity of science places her more in line with Pope Francis than Jeb Bush.

"I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain," Clinton says in the opening lines of the video. "I know what's happening in the world is going to have a big effect on my daughter, and especially on my granddaughter."

Clinton goes on to attack her Republican foes, including frontrunners like Bush, Donald Trump, Rick Perry and Sen. Marco Rubio, for rejecting climate-change science — or, just science in general — in 2015. More and more, taking a stance against climate change has become a hallmark of the Republican Party, and Clinton wants to make sure none of us forgets it.

"It's hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change," Clinton says. "Who would rather remind us they're not scientists than listen to those who are."

"You don't have to be a scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all," Clinton continues."You just have to be willing to act."

So, what is HRC going to do about this climate-change threat? First, she praised the renewable energy industry for preventing premature deaths and asthma attacks, while also creating new jobs for Americans.

But Clinton also put forth a much stronger call to action in her latest video. "On day one as president, I will set two ambitious national goals that will test our capacities," Clinton said.

And her two goals are (drumroll, please):

- ensuring America has more than half a billion solar panels installed across the country by the end of 2020
- set a 10-year goal of generating renewable energy that can power "every single home" in the United States

Clinton promised that a "comprehensive agenda" will be released within the next few months, but she did give a few hints while addressing a crowd of supporters in Ames, Iowa, on Sunday. For instance, Clinton said she plans to use tax incentives, including a possible renewable of the wind energy tax credit, to reach her 10-year goal of powering homes in America with renewable energy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The former secretary of state also talked about transitioning America from fossil fuels to new sources of energy. “We need to get the incentives fixed in our tax system which as you know are too heavily weighted toward fossil fuels,” Clinton said Sunday in Iowa.

So far, Clinton’s video is a welcome change from much of the climate-change talk we’ve been hearing this campaign season. While we await Clinton’s full agenda, we can at least take comfort in knowing that Clinton has more in common with Pope Francis than Rick “The Pope Is Not A Scientist” Santorum et al.

How Hillary Clinton's Climate Change Plan Stands Up To Martin O'Malley's, aka The Only Two Global Warming Strategies In The Entire Race // Bustle // Kendyl Kearly – July 27, 2015

It’s still 2015, but candidates in the 2016 presidential race have already begun to claim the most important issues to their platforms, and hash out large-scale plans for dealing with them. Environmentalism is a huge cause for the major candidates on the left, and two of them have been the first to share large environmental protection agendas. On Sunday evening, Hillary Clinton joined Martin O’Malley in providing climate change plans.

O’Malley shared his ideas for a green presidency back in June, winning Democratic praise for being the first major candidate to do so. The proposal is aggressive and came right after Pope Francis’ encyclical that expressed the need to protect the Earth from climate change. Although Clinton and O’Malley have the same goal in mind, their plans to accomplish it have some notable differences.

One of Clinton’s largest goals centers around solar energy. She says she will expand the amount of installed solar capacity by 700 percent by 2020. According to her website, she wants more than half a billion panels installed by the end of her first term.

O’Malley also wants clean energy to be a part of his presidency. He advocates for the extension of tax credits that fuel the wind and solar panel industries. He would launch an organization that centers around financing community wind and solar programs. He supports loans and grants for farmers and small business owners that encourage them to adopt clean energy.

Unlike Clinton, O’Malley mentioned the use of biofuels. As president, he would use tax credits and EPA volume targets to build a thriving biofuel industry. Although Clinton has not yet said whether biofuels would be a part of her plan, she supported their use during her 2008 campaign.

O’Malley believes that the way to make his plan sustainable is through training workers to embrace environmentally friendly practices. He wants to create an organization that focuses on clean energy jobs. This organization would theoretically partner with communities, build clean energy infrastructures, make buildings more energy efficient, and expand fields and forests. Clinton mentioned a “Clean Energy Challenge” that would partner with states, cities, and rural communities, but it’s unclear now what exactly such a challenge would do for those communities.

Whereas Clinton keeps her agenda related to clean energy, O’Malley addresses job creation and economic issues with his ideas. He has also expressed his disapproval of off-shore drilling and tar sand oil energy, while Clinton has been less clear on such controversial environmental issues.

Their timelines differ as well. O’Malley believes that in 35 years, the country could be 100 percent powered by clean energy. Clinton says that by 2020, renewable energy could be a third of all energy generated. Her other goal is for every American home to be powered by clean energy within 10 years of taking office.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At this point, O'Malley's plan is a lot more specific than Clinton's when it comes to implementation and funding. However, Clinton says she will give more details in the coming months. Though she's given more concrete ideas than most other Democratic candidates, she might face pressure to add more specifics if she wants to compare favorably to O'Malley.

Hillary Clinton's Plan to Combat Climate Change With Half-A-Billion Solar Panels //ThinkProgress // Emily Atkin – July 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton is going all in on renewable energy.

On Sunday evening, the Democratic presidential candidate released a fact sheet detailing her plan to fight climate change, and it focuses heavily on promoting clean energy generation across the country.

Among other things, the plan includes a promise to install half a billion solar panels by 2021, or the end of Clinton's first term. That would represent a 700 percent increase from current installations, she said. Clinton also promised that, if elected, enough renewable energy would be produced to power every home in the country within 10 years.

"We can make a transition over time from a fossil fuel economy, predominantly, to a clean renewable energy economy, predominantly," Clinton said in Iowa on Sunday, Yahoo reported.

The aggressive transition to renewables proposed by Clinton would be achieved partially through extending and strengthening tax breaks those industries, Clinton said. Last week, the Senate proposed renewing two tax incentives for the wind industry, which are currently expired.

Clinton is expected to explain more details of the plan during a Monday event in Des Moines, according to Yahoo's report.

Though Clinton has been outspoken about the need to address climate change, many environmentalists have expressed doubt that her policies would be as strong as they may like. They often point to her historic "inclination" to approve the controversial Keystone XL tar sands pipeline, and her support for domestic fossil fuel production, specifically natural gas.

But tackling climate change has been central to Clinton's campaign so far. In her campaign kick-off speech, she promised to make America "the clean energy superpower of the 21st century" and condemned Republican politicians for willfully ignoring the science behind human-caused warming. Her campaign chairman John Podesta was the architect of President Obama's plan to tackle carbon emissions through regulations, and Clinton has promised to keep those regulations in place "at all costs." As ThinkProgress pointed out in April, Clinton's is the first major presidential campaign ever to make combating climate change a central issue.

That certainly does not mean that Clinton's is the only presidential campaign that's put a hard focus on tackling global warming. Indeed, Democratic contender Martin O'Malley arguably has an even more aggressive climate agenda. His plan is to make the country powered completely by renewable energy by 2050 — meaning no fossil fuel use at all. He has condemned President Obama for approving offshore drilling, supporting domestic oil production, and shying away from bold stances on high-carbon tar sands oil from Canada, which would be transported by the Keystone XL pipeline if it were approved.

"We cannot meet the climate challenge with an all-of-the-above energy strategy, or by drilling off our coasts, or by building pipelines that bring oil from tar sands in Canada," O'Malley wrote in an op-ed published last month.

Clinton's other Democratic rival, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-VT) hasn't released an official climate plan yet. But in an interview with the Washington Post in May, he said he would go further than President Obama has in tackling the problem.

Sanders' plan, he said, "would look like a tax on carbon; a massive investment in solar, wind, geothermal; it would be making sure that every home and building in this country is properly winterized; it would be putting substantial money into rail, both passenger and cargo, so we can move towards breaking our dependency on automobiles. And it would be leading other countries around the world."

Hillary Clinton proposes installing half a billion solar panels across America by 2020 // Fusion // Rob Wile – July 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton released Sunday the outlines of how she would tackle climate change if elected president, proposing two ambitious goals.

First, she would install half a billion solar panels across America by the end of her first term.

It would represent an approximately 546%-increase from current production levels. The average solar panel produces 200 watts, and current U.S. solar photovoltaic output was 18.3 gigawatts as of January 2015 according to GTM Research.

This would be part of a larger plan to allow every home in the U.S. to be powered by renewable energy within a decade of her taking office. Currently the residential sector consumes 40% of total electricity output in the U.S, and electricity accounts for 40% of all U.S. energy consumption.

She's calling it the "Clean Energy Challenge," and published this chart to show how much renewable energy would be generated compared with proposals set forth in President Obama's Clean Power Plan:

"Through these goals," the campaign says on its website, "we will increase the amount of installed solar capacity by 700% by 2020, expand renewable energy to at least a third of all electricity generation, prevent thousands of premature deaths and tens of thousands of asthma attacks each year, and put our country on a path to achieve deep emission reductions by 2050."

However, she does not propose ending fossil fuel consumption. Instead, she says she wants to, "reduce the amount of oil consumed in the United States and around the world," and to make sure it is being produced in a "safe and responsible."

No further details were provided on these points.

Many GOPers including Marco Rubio have responded to questions about how they'd address climate change with variations on "I'm not a scientist" (that group also includes Jeb Bush, though he also acknowledged that climate change was occurring but that a balance had to be struck between addressing it without incurring major economic costs).

At an Iowa campaign event Sunday, the Wall Street Journal's Colleen McCain Nelson reported, Hillary mocked the "scientist" remarks.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I’m not a scientist either—I’m just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain…I know that if we start addressing it, we’re going to actually be creating jobs and new businesses.”

Last week, renowned climate scientist James Hansen issued one of the most dire climate warnings in years, finding that glaciers at both poles are melting 10-times faster than previously believed, the result of a feedback loop of cold water from already-melting glaciers forcing warmer saltwater underneath remaining glaciers.

As a result, the seas are going to rise way faster, and sooner, than anyone is prepared for.

“We conclude that continued high emissions will make multi-meter sea level rise practically unavoidable and likely to occur this century,” he wrote. “Social disruption and economic consequences of such large sea level rise could be devastating. It is not difficult to imagine that conflicts arising from forced migrations and economic collapse might make the planet ungovernable, threatening the fabric of civilization.”

We are now just four months away from the Paris Climate Conference, at which countries are supposed to come up with a sweeping agreement to address climate change.

But as Slate climate correspondent Eric Holthaus reports, the policies being floated in advance of the summit would actually lead to 3.1 degrees Celsius-temperature-rise this century, according to Climate Action Tracker, a group of independent climate research organizations, with both the U.S.’s and China’s CO2 reduction plans rated as inadequate.

What McCain Economic Policy? (Washington Post 7/17/08)
By Harold Meyerson; A21
"Government is not the solution to our problem," Ronald Reagan told his fellow Americans in his first inaugural address. "Government is the problem." For modern American conservatism, Reagan's words may as well have been inscribed on the tablets handed down at Mount Sinai. The market was god and Reagan was its Moses, and Republicans have sworn fealty to both for the past quarter-century. One invariable feature of the 2007-08 Republican primary debates was the effort of each candidate to cast himself as Reagan's one true heir. John McCain proudly recounted how he enlisted as a foot soldier in Reagan's revolution. How was he to know that government was about to become a solution again?

Memo to Obama, McCain: No one wins in a war (Boston Globe 7/17/08)
By Howard Zinn
BARACK OBAMA and John McCain continue to argue about war. McCain says to keep the troops in Iraq until we "win" and supports sending more troops to Afghanistan. Obama says to withdraw some (not all) troops from Iraq and send them to fight and "win" in Afghanistan. ... Have they learned nothing from recent history? Have they not learned that no one "wins" in a war, but that hundreds of thousands of humans die, most of them civilians, many of them children?

McCain: You've Got Authenticity -- It's Time for Something Else (Huffington Post 7/16/08)
By Tom Alderman
"Let McCain be McCain," is the campaign mantra. His greatest appeal is when people get a sense of how authentic he is, says Senior advisor Mark Salter. Sounds right. We value authentic individuality. It's part of our national DNA -- which is why Sen. McCain has been so front-and-center all these years. He's nailed authentic -- and it isn't enough.

Bush Exerts Executive Privilege Over Cheney Interview in House CIA Leak Probe (AP 7/16/08)
President Bush has asserted executive privilege to prevent Attorney General Michael Mukasey from having to comply with a House panel subpoena for material on the leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity. A House committee chairman, meanwhile, held off on a contempt citation of Mukasey — who had requested the privilege claim — but only as a courtesy to lawmakers not present. Rep. Henry Waxman, chairman of the House Oversight Committee, rejected Mukasey's suggestion that Vice President Dick Cheney's FBI interview on the CIA leak should be protected by the privilege claim — and therefore not turned over to the panel.

Bush Administration Trying To Redefine Contraception As Abortion (The Gavel 7/16/08)
The New York Times reports that the Bush Administration's Department of Health and Human Services is drafting a rule that would place new restrictions on domestic family planning programs. While current law allows health care providers and professionals to refuse to provide abortions based on their religious beliefs, this provision would threaten the funding of organizations and health facilities if they do not hire people who would refuse to provide birth control and defines abortion so broadly that it would include many types of birth control, including oral contraception.

SUMMARY OF THIS WEEKEND'S NEWS

Hillary Clinton announced she will spend next week in Iowa and New Hampshire to share her ideas about her plans to make pro-small business policies a focus of her presidential bid.

George Stephanopoulos, is under scrutiny for his previously undisclosed $75,000 contribution to the Clinton Foundation. NBC Universal, News Corporation, Turner Broadcasting and Thomson Reuters are among more than a dozen media organizations that have made charitable contributions to the Clinton Foundation in recent years, the foundation's records show. The donations, which range from the low-thousands to the millions, provide a clear picture of the media industry's ties to the Clinton Foundation.

Political reactions to George Stephanopoulos's admission of donations to the Clinton Foundation continued on Friday, with questions centering on whether the former Clinton strategist was fit to moderate presidential debates. Most 2016 Democratic presidential hopefuls shrugged off questions about a possible conflict of interest after Stephanopoulos revealed he donated $75,000 to the foundation from 2012 to 2014.

THIS WEEKEND'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton to Pitch Herself as Candidate for Small Businesses // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein - May 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton plans to make pro-small business policies a focus of her presidential bid and will spend next week in Iowa and New Hampshire to begin sharing those ideas, a senior campaign official said Friday.

Clinton sees small businesses as being at a critical post-recession moment in which, with the right policies, they can thrive, the official said, and will outline her suggestions for ways to encourage risk-taking on Main Street over what the official described as irresponsible speculation on Wall Street.

Among her ideas: finding ways to cut red tape for small businesses and entrepreneurs; expanding access to capital; simplifying taxes and offering relief for business owners; and boosting their ability to export.

On Tuesday, she'll discuss her proposals at a roundtable with small business owners, in Cedar Falls, after spending Monday at smaller events in North Central Iowa. On Friday, she'll meet with business owners in New Hampshire. In between, on Wednesday, she'll make a pit-stop in Chicago for three $2,700 per person fundraisers.

Next week will mark the first time since she declared herself a candidate that Clinton will devote to visiting small businesses and meeting with entrepreneurs, but she's already discussed some of her ideas of those ideas at least briefly, most notably during a roundtable last month at Capital City Fruit, a fruit distributor just outside Des Moines. There, she heard from entrepreneurs who struggled to get loans for their businesses and had concerns about the rising cost of health care. She mentioned wanting to cut red tape, though she didn't say how she would do so, nor did the official who offered a preview of next week's plans.

She also foreshadowed her plans to emphasize policies for small businesses when she interjected last week at a Las Vegas roundtable on immigration: "I want to be the president for small business."

Clinton hasn't yet discussed her ideas for helping small businesses export their products. And on trade, she's laid out only broad principles. Spokesman Nick Merrill said in a last month that her standards for supporting the Trans-Pacific Partnership, the trade deal under consideration by Congress, included determining whether it would "open new opportunities for our small businesses to export overseas" while protecting American workers and companies. Though she supported the trade deal while serving as secretary of state during President Barack Obama's first term, Clinton has yet to take a definitive stance on TPP, in what's widely seen as effort to avoid undermining her former boss or upsetting liberals.

Clinton's attention to small business, which the official said will be a constant throughout the campaign, is also a way for Clinton to remind voters of her humble beginnings, long before she was paid hundreds of thousands of dollars to deliver a single speech or started having around-the-clock Secret Service protection. Her father, Hugh Rodham, owned a small drapery business in their hometown of Park Ridge, Ill., just outside Chicago, that Clinton has often mentioned in public appearances since launching her campaign last month.

To gear up for her trip, Clinton spent Thursday visiting small businesses near her campaign headquarters in Brooklyn Heights—Area Kids, a children's toy and clothing store; Brooklyn Women's Exchange, nonprofit craft shop; and Monty Q's, a pizza place.

As she toured Montague Street in the well-to-do neighborhood, a camera crew filmed her visiting those businesses.

Clinton Foundation donors include dozens of media organizations, individuals // Politico // Josh Gerstein, Tarini Parti, Hadas Gold, and Dylan Byers - May 15, 2015

NBC Universal, News Corporation, Turner Broadcasting and Thomson Reuters are among more than a dozen media organizations that have made charitable contributions to the Clinton Foundation in recent years, the foundation's records show.

The donations, which range from the low-thousands to the millions, provide a picture of the media industry's ties to the Clinton Foundation at a time when one of its most notable personalities, George Stephanopoulos, is under scrutiny for his previously undisclosed $75,000 contribution.

The list also includes mass media groups like Comcast, Time Warner and Viacom, as well a few notable individuals, including Carlos Slim, the Mexican telecom magnate and largest shareholder of The New York Times Company, and James Murdoch, the chief operating officer of 21st Century Fox. Both Slim and Murdoch have given between $1 million to $5 million, respectively.

Judy Woodruff, the co-anchor and managing editor of PBS NewsHour, gave $250 to the foundation's “Clinton Haiti Relief Fund" in 2010.

The following list includes news media organizations that have donated to the foundation, as well as other media networks, companies, foundations or individuals that have donated. It is organized by the size of the contribution:

Most Dems shrug off Stephanopoulos's disclosure of Clinton donations // CNN // Dan Merica - May 15, 2015

Political reactions to ABC News chief anchor George Stephanopoulos's admission of donations to the Clinton Foundation continued on Friday, with questions centering on whether the former Clinton strategist was fit to moderate presidential debates.

Most 2016 Democratic presidential hopefuls shrugged off questions about a possible conflict of interest after Stephanopoulos revealed he donated $75,000 to the foundation from 2012 to 2014, which he did not disclose during a recent interview with the author of an anti-Clinton book.

But former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee's spokeswoman said Stephanopoulos breached journalistic ethics.

"Governor Chafee believes it is a clear violation of the Society of Professional Journalists' Code of Ethics," said Debbie Rich. "When asked about whether journalists should engage in political activity, the SPJ Ethics Committee says the simplest answer is 'No.' Don't do it. Don't get involved. Don't contribute money, don't work in a campaign, don't lobby, and especially, don't run for office yourself."

Vermont Independent Sen. Bernie Sanders, the only declared Democratic candidate besides Hillary Clinton, told

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Brianna Keilar on CNN's "State of the Union" in an interview scheduled to air Sunday that Stephanopoulos should have made the donations public earlier.

But, Sanders added, "I don't -- between you and me -- I don't think it's the biggest deal in the world."

Lis Smith, former Gov. Martin O'Malley's top aide, said that Stephanopoulos' Clinton ties don't worry their operation. "We have immense respect for him, and he has always been fair," she said.

And Craig Crawford, former Sen. Jim Webb's spokesman, said in an emailed statement that he can't see Stephanopoulos' ties "making any difference to Jim."

Chafee, O'Malley and Webb have not announced whether they will run or not. O'Malley is expected to run and will announce his decision on May 30 in May.

Republican National Committee chairman Reince Priebus called the donations issue "obviously troubling" on Fox News's "Hannity" on Thursday night.

Most of the Republican candidates for President have stayed quiet about the controversy so far, but Rand Paul said on "Hannity" Thursday night that "he's too close to the Clintons to really give an objective interview."

Wisconsin Republican Rep. Paul Ryan, also speaking on CNN's "State of the Union," added that he thought Stephanopoulos has shown a liberal bias in his previous moderations of Republican debates.

"Look, I got no issues with George," Ryan said. "He's a nice guy. But you know, he has -- everybody has political views."

Stephanopoulos told CNN that he would not moderate ABC's planned Republican presidential primary debate, but that he would continue covering the 2016 race. In a conversation with CNN's Brian Stelter on Thursday, the anchor said his only remaining relationship to the Clintons is a journalistic one.

Stephanopoulos was one of former President Bill Clinton's top aides during his 1992 presidential campaign and remained a close adviser in the White House. He left the Clinton administration after the first term and became a political analyst for ABC shortly thereafter.

WASHINGTON — A Twitter post recently caught the eye of Bill McKibben, the environmental advocate and godfather of the Keystone XL pipeline protests. It included an image from “The Simpsons” showing Homer and his family basking in mountains of cash in their living room, followed by a report on Hillary Rodham Clinton’s appearing at a fund-raiser with a lobbyist from the Keystone fight.

Mr. McKibben’s environmental organization, 350.org , has been trying to raise awareness about the ties it sees between lobbyists for the oil pipeline and former aides to Mrs. Clinton. He promptly shared the post with his 150,000 Twitter followers, and the reaction was immediate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“You expect different from a Clinton?” one person responded on Twitter. And from another: “Did you need another reason not to vote for Hillary Clinton?” Lost in the response was the source of the offending tweet. It was not another environmental organization or even a liberal challenger to Mrs. Clinton. Instead, it was a conservative group called America Rising PAC, which is trying, with laserlike focus, to weaken the woman who almost everyone believes will be the Democratic Party’s candidate for president in 2016.

Continue reading the main story

For months now, America Rising has sent out a steady stream of posts on social media attacking Mrs. Clinton, some of them specifically designed to be spotted, and shared, by liberals. The posts highlight critiques of her connections to Wall Street and the Clinton Foundation and feature images of Democrats like Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts and Mayor Bill de Blasio of New York, interspersed with cartoon characters and pictures of Kevin Spacey, who plays the villain in “House of Cards.” And as they are read and shared, an anti-Clinton narrative is reinforced.

America Rising is not the only conservative group attacking Mrs. Clinton from the left. Another is American Crossroads, the group started by Karl Rove, which has been sending out its own digital content, including one ad using a speech Ms. Warren gave at the New Populism Conference in Washington last May.

“Powerful interests have tried to capture Washington and rig the system in their favor,” intones Ms. Warren, as images of Mrs. Clinton with foreign leaders flash by.

The new-style digital campaign captures some basic facts about 21st-century communication: Information travels at warp speed on social media, it is sometimes difficult to know where that information comes from, and most people like to read things with which they agree. The result, said Ken Goldstein, a professor of politics at the University of San Francisco who specializes in political advertising, is something more sophisticated.

“Politics is usually basic math,” he said, “and this is a little bit of calculus, thinking a couple steps ahead.”

The tactic is making for some awkward moments online. The A.F.L.-C.I.O. sent to its more than 60,000 followers an America Rising tweet praising its president, Richard L. Trumka, for a speech that was seen as challenging Mrs. Clinton on economic issues, only to take it down a few hours later, saying it was a mistake.

Laura Hart Cole of Verbank, N.Y., whose father, Philip A. Hart, was a senator from Michigan and a liberal icon, was shocked to learn that she had, like Mr. McKibben, shared the meme from America Rising on Twitter. Republican groups, she said, “have a history of sleazy tactics.” But she added: “I guess it’s fair. If what they’re saying is factual, then I guess it’s fair play. It’s a dirty game.”

Conservative strategists and operatives say they are simply filling a vacuum on the far left, as well as applying the lesson they learned in 2012, when they watched in frustration as Mitt Romney was forced to expend time and resources in a protracted primary fight. By the time he secured his party’s nomination, President Obama hardly had to make the case that his opponent was a coldhearted plutocrat; Republicans like Newt Gingrich had already made the argument for him in the primaries.

Few Republicans are more familiar with that nightmare than Matt Rhoades, who was Mr. Romney’s campaign manager. He founded America Rising in response to a recommendation contained in an autopsy of Romney’s failed presidential run that was ordered by the Republican National Committee. The group’s original goal was to compete with American Bridge, the Democratic opposition research group, but its focus under Mr. Rhoades has been to subject Mrs. Clinton to an ordeal similar to Mr. Romney’s.

“The idea is to make her life difficult in the primary and challenge her from the left,” said Colin Reed, America

Rising's executive director. "We don't want her to enter the general election not having been pushed from the left, so if we have opportunities — creative ways, especially online — to push her from the left, we'll do it just to show those folks who she needs to turn out that she's not in line with them."

No one thinks attacking Mrs. Clinton from the left is likely to turn the most liberal Democrats into Republican voters. But Steven Law, president of American Crossroads, said the goal was simply to erode what should be her natural core of support.

"It can diminish enthusiasm for Hillary among the base over time," he said. "And if you diminish enthusiasm, lukewarm support can translate into lackluster fund-raising and perhaps diminished turnout down the road."

This year, Zac Moffatt, a co-founder of Targeted Victory, a right-leaning political technology firm, who handled Mr. Romney's digital operation and has worked with groups like America Rising and American Crossroads, laid out the strategy in a memo to several clients. "There was a hole to fill in the market," he said, and if Democrats were not willing to challenge Mrs. Clinton, Republicans could do it themselves.

"We were seeing people on the left who were interested in content about Hillary Clinton, and that there would be opportunities for groups to share this information with Democrats on the left," Mr. Moffatt said.

To reach these groups, Mr. Moffatt had a plan: using micro-targeted advertising units on social media platforms like Facebook, Twitter and YouTube.

For example, as Mrs. Clinton was traveling through Las Vegas this month on a campaign swing, "liberal Democrats" (as identified by Targeted Victory's voter file) in the Las Vegas area saw a video pop into their Facebook news feeds, highlighting recent news reports about foreign government donations to the Clinton Foundation. The video was shared by America Rising and received over 6,300 views, most from people who would never follow a group like America Rising on social media.

Other groups are also using micro-targeted advertising to inject their content into the Facebook and Twitter news feeds of "liberal Democrats," environmentalists and declared supporters of Ms. Warren, among others.

"You might start looking at union households. You might start looking at Bernie Sanders's core of support," Mr. Moffatt said, referring to Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Mr. Law said members of his staff at American Crossroads had easily been able to inhabit the liberal role, despite being fervent Republicans. "We wear these little bracelets — W.W.E.W.D.," Mr. Law joked, referring to "What would Elizabeth Warren do?"

In the face of Republican activity aimed at undermining its liberal support, the Clinton campaign has been publicly circumspect. Asked for a comment, it would only note that in a Quinnipiac University poll last month, Mrs. Clinton led her closest opponent, Mr. Sanders, by 46 points among voters who consider themselves "very liberal."

And even some of those unhappy with Mrs. Clinton, like Joel Gombiner of Brooklyn — who posted the "Did you need another reason?" response to the Twitter message shared by Mr. McKibben — think the conservative groups may be outsmarting themselves.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“They view this as a means of weakening the Democratic Party and weakening the chance in a presidential election,” said Mr. Gombiner, 26. But “that’s the whole point of a democracy, that the arguments make you stronger.”

House Votes to Block Undocumented Youth From Serving in the Military // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur - May 15, 2015

A vote Thursday evening in the House of Representatives provided a jarring reminder of how far the national immigration debate has shifted in the last two years.

By a margin of 221 to 202, the chamber voted to strip language from the National Defense Authorization Act that would have encouraged the Pentagon to allow young undocumented immigrants to serve in the military if they're protected under President Barack Obama's Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program (commonly called DACA).

All 221 votes came from Republicans; 20 Republicans joined a unanimous Democratic caucus to oppose the amendment, offered by Representative Mo Brooks, Republican of Alabama.

The political implications were immediately on display as Democrat Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign released a statement criticizing the House.

"If these courageous young men and women want to serve, they should be honored and celebrated, not discriminated against," said Amanda Renteria, Clinton's national political director, adding that "[w]hile we keep up the pressure for comprehensive action, allowing DREAMers to serve in the military is the right step forward."

None of the top Republican presidential contenders weighed in. A spokesperson for Senator Ted Cruz of Texas, an outspoken critic of illegal immigration, declined to comment. The issue captures a schism between many base voters who oppose leniency for people in the country illegally and Hispanic voters in swing states who support pro-immigration policies.

For Republicans in Congress, the base appears to be winning, marking a sea change since the Senate voted 68-32 in June 2013 to grant a path to citizenship for the estimated 11 million undocumented immigrants.

Brooks hailed the Thursday vote as a defeat for those "who seek to help illegal aliens" and "deprive American citizens and lawful immigrants of military service opportunities." The initial language favoring DREAMers in the military was offered by Representative Ruben Gallego, Democrat of Arizona.

Snapchat is going to be huge in 2016 — and regulators have no idea how to handle it // Fusion // Brett Logiurato – May 6, 2015

As he gears up for a presidential run, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley held a conference call with donors and supporters Thursday night, informing them that he would make some kind of announcement on May 30.

He also had a message — and an exclusive photo — for his followers on Snapchat.

"Stay tuned for May 30th…" he said, referring to the date when he'll announce whether or not he'll challenge former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton for the Democratic nomination.

O'Malley, who is widely expected to run, is one of a handful of politicians experimenting with Snapchat, a messaging app that has exploded in popularity over the past year.

O'Malley's team has found it useful — along with the streaming app Periscope — to engage a broad audience. They'll post candid photos and videos of O'Malley's impromptu guitar-playing on the stump, for example.

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Kentucky), who declared his candidacy for the Republican nomination last month, has been using the service for almost a year and a half in an attempt to garner support from young people — and young followers. Rep. Sean Duffy (R-Wisconsin), of "Real World" fame, is spearheading Snapchat's use in the House of Representatives. Other campaigns said tentative plans with Snapchat are in the works, or that they're looking to the potential of experimenting with the service.

Combine that with the news that Snapchat has hired Peter Hamby, a well-respected CNN political reporter, to head its new news division. It's a good bet that Snapchat stands to be the breakout app of the 2016 campaign, much in the same way other services like Twitter and YouTube have blossomed in the recent past.

"In every election cycle, campaigns will have new technology to employ," said Paul S. Ryan, the senior counsel for the Campaign Legal Center. "In that sense, it's nothing new. We've gone through this before."

What is new, however, is the potential conundrum that an app like Snapchat uniquely presents. One of the key features that has made it popular with young people is the fact that its messages disappear within seconds — unless the user receiving the Snapchat takes a screenshot.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For its part, the Federal Election Commission sounds quite unsure how and if it would attempt to regulate not just Snapchat, but any app. Julia Queen, a spokeswoman for the FEC, told Fusion that the commission has "internet regulations but they don't specifically cover apps."

The commission has also issued advisory opinions — which Queen said is "its official response to a question about how federal campaign finance law applies to a specific factual situation" — on issues arising from text messages and campaigns.

The potential challenge here for the FEC, Ryan said, would come in enforcement. If someone wants to break the rules via Snapchat, how would anyone know?

"That Snapchats do disappear could present an interesting enforcement challenge for the FEC," Ryan said. "You can subpoena email. Tweets are public. You can examine archived records. That seemingly would not be the case with Snapchat."

Fusion also reached out to the House Ethics Committee as part of a story on Duffy, who frequently uses Snapchat to communicate with his staff and constituents. They did not have comment.

FEC Chair Ann Ravel responded to a tweet last year asking what she thought about a story that detailed potential violations involving the use of Twitter.

That story detailed how some Republican groups and allied "super PACs" shared polling data through anonymous, sometimes West Wing-themed Twitter accounts. Super PACs, which can raise unlimited amounts of money to support candidates, cannot directly coordinate with candidates or official party committees.

The question in the story is whether or not those messages violated election law. It wasn't enough that the information was posted publicly — anyone can see those messages. But Ryan said it would be a violation if there was a private "decoder ring" that groups shared with one another to decipher the poll numbers.

Could there be a similar issue arising with an app like Snapchat — where groups could send each other sensitive information that could disappear without a trace?

"The potential problem would be that there could be no record of violations with the law," Ryan said.

The proverbial 'smoking gun,'" he added, "disappears. It's a unique mode of communication that evaporates."

But for now, most candidates are looking past the potential regulatory issues and see the app as a potential goldmine for attracting younger eyeballs. Paul's team has used the app to provide a behind-the-scenes look into the candidate's stump appearances, as well as glimpses into television interviews and more.

Sergio Gor, a spokesman for Paul, told Fusion that the campaign doesn't think about any of the prospective regulatory snafus. But he said Paul views the app as an essential tool toward growing the Republican Party's reach with an expanded base of voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paul "believes that we must take our message far and wide," Gor said. "As the first member of congress to have joined Snapchat in January 2014, our team has discovered that we are able to reach a young and highly energized audience. Senator Paul has made it a mission to make the Republican party bigger and bolder and engaging new audiences such as Snapchat is vital if we want to grow the party."

SNL's Hillary Clinton Looks Forward to Relaxing Summer Full of Ruthless Campaigning // Mediate // Tina Nyguen – May 17, 2015

Saturday Night Live is about to let out for the summer — season finale, yall — but while everyone is at the beach, soaking up the sun and jumping in the waves, Kate McKinnon's Hillary Clinton will do everything humanly possible to win the presidential election that's over a year and a half from now.

Does it mean walking through a beach in a wool pantsuit? Running alongside a tandem bicycle? Making children cry about their sandcastles not being as nice as your scale model of the White House? Pffft,

(And Darrell Hammond's Bill Clinton, well — yeah, he likes summer too.)

Reid: O'Malley Who? Leader Dismisses All but Clinton // Roll Call // Steven Dennis - May 15, 2015

Harry Reid, in classic Harry Reid style, utterly dismissed the presidential aspirations of his Senate colleague Bernard E. Sanders, former Sen. Jim Webb and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley in one biting sentence in an interview airing Friday.

For the Senate minority leader, the independent from Vermont and the Democrats from Virginia and Maryland governor, respectively, don't even merit a mention.

"Right now we have Hillary Clinton. And that's it," the Nevada Democrat told MSNBC's and Telemundo's Jose Diaz-Balart. "There's not another Barack Obama out there. There are no all stars out there. She has a clear field and I'm glad she does."

Why Hillary Needs Obama // Cook Political // Amy Walter - May 13, 2015

Every presidential election is a response to the current president, even when the current president isn't seeking re-election. If people don't like the guy in the White House, it's almost impossible for a member of his party to be elected to succeed him. Even when voters are happy with their incumbent president, it's not always a guarantee of success for the party's nominee. Voters are often looking for a change in style as much as substance (see: Bush v. Gore, 2000). This is why we should spend as much time checking in on President Obama's job approval ratings as we do the polling data of the potential presidential candidates.

For Hillary Clinton to win, she needs Obama to succeed. Picking fights with the president – a la Elizabeth Warren – does her no good if it makes him look weak.

The magic number for Obama – and ultimately Hillary's chances – is somewhere around 47 percent. If Obama's job approval rating is above that, a Democrat has a decent to a good chance of winning in 2016. Below that number, especially if Obama is in the 45 percent range or below, it will be hard for a Democrat to gain entry to 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue.

How Obama is perceived by voters in the presidential battleground states is more important than his overall national approval rating. Given that the fight for the Electoral College will come down to the results of seven to nine states, a national poll does us little good. The good folks at the Quinnipiac University Poll have been surveying many of these key swing states and I've incorporated their data into the accompanying chart.

In looking at data from five swing states (all of which Obama carried in 2012), Obama's approval ratings are not only significantly below his pre-election showing in 2012, but they also fall below the political "Mendoza line", with no state giving him better than a 45 percent job approval rating. One of the most surprising is Obama's weak 40 percent approve to 56 percent disapprove in Pennsylvania, an important brick in the Democrats so-called "Blue Wall."

Helpful disclaimer alert: we are working with a very small universe of data from April (one pollster and one poll) and there's certainly a possibility that these numbers may be more outlier than reality. However, there are warning signs out here for Democrats and we should all watch these numbers very closely over the next year and a half. While a popular president can't always ensure his party's success in the next election, a weak one almost always ensures failure.

Hillary touts Beyonce's support // The Hill // Jesse Byrnes - May 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton has the support of Beyoncé, and her camp is showing it off.

Playing off of fans' nickname for the singer, Clinton's campaign tweeted Friday: "Say you'll Bey on Team #Hillary2016, too: http://hrc.io/1KaIjGw "

Beyoncé and others, such as Sharon Osbourne and Meghan Trainor, attended a fundraiser co-hosted in Manhattan by L.A. Reid, the chairman and CEO of Sony Music Entertainment's Epic Records this week.

It was one of a trio of $2,700-per-attendee fundraisers in which Clinton was expected to rake in more than $1 million, according to Bloomberg, and amid her push for money among celebrities.

Beyoncé and husband Jay Z hosted fundraisers for President Obama's reelection campaign in 2012, and the female pop star powerhouse appeared at events for both of Obama's inaugurations.

At least one Beyoncé fan has urged the mega singer to team up with Clinton in 2016.

Republicans criticize Clinton for not talking to press // Salon // Associated Press - May 16, 2015

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) — Republican presidential hopefuls gathered in Iowa are taking jabs at Democratic candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton for not fielding more questions from the press.

Former business executive Carly Fiorina says that if Clinton is going to run for president, "she is going to have to answer some questions."

Fiorina spoke at a dinner hosted by the Iowa Republican Party that drew about 1,300 people Saturday. Also chiming in was Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, who joked about whether Clinton “ever takes any questions.”

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush took a similar approach earlier in the day, saying he has answered hundreds of questions compared to Clinton, who has taken just a handful.

The former secretary of state is making a second campaign visit to Iowa on Monday.

Asked for a comment, it would only note that in a Quinnipiac University poll last month, Mrs. Clinton led her closest opponent, Mr. Sanders, by 46 points among voters who consider themselves “very liberal.”

And even some of those unhappy with Mrs. Clinton, like Joel Gombiner of Brooklyn — who posted the “Did you need another reason?” response to the Twitter message shared by Mr. McKibben — think the conservative groups may be outsmarting themselves.

“They view this as a means of weakening the Democratic Party and weakening the chance in a presidential election,” said Mr. Gombiner, 26. But “that’s the whole point of a democracy, that the arguments make you stronger.”

Meet the guy who was protected Hillary Clinton's Wikipedia page for almost a decade // Business Insider // Maxwell Tani - May 15, 2015

Since 2006, Hillary Clinton has carefully adjusted her positions on major issues like same-sex marriage and the war in Iraq. Through every step of that evolution, one man was there to note each change.

Jonathan Schilling, a New Jersey software engineer, has been a highly-active editor of Clinton's Wikipedia page since 2006. During that time Schilling logged at least 2,269 edits over 10 years to the former Secretary of State's popular page.

Clinton's page gets an enormous amount of traffic, which Schilling estimates was close to 150,000 monthly views before Clinton announced her 2016 presidential campaign last month.

Since 2006, Schilling has kept a watchful eye over Clinton's Wikipedia entry, eliminating unsubstantiated claims, and clipping out bias and inaccuracy. His edits are usually small: a tense changed, a credible source added, facts tweaked to reflect new reporting.

Wikipedia is a crowdsourced platform, and many users make edits to Clinton's page. But few have logged the hours that Schilling has. According to Wikipedia's stats, he has been the top editor of the page for years.

Schilling sees keeping political biases out of entries as a major part of his volunteer job. He told Business Insider a trick to keep out ideologically-motivated editors is to address controversies thoroughly and include the details.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I intentionally make these things long because then you can include everything: the good, the bad the ugly, the neutral," Schilling said. "So, everybody who reads it should be able to get some idea, something about it here or there."

Schilling said he also relies heavily on facts attributed to concrete sources, avoiding trend pieces from news outlets like Politico that he perceives as important, but occasionally suspect.

"You actually have to be careful with using Politico articles as a source on Wikipedia because they're under so much pressure to churn out stuff," Schilling explained. "They find trends one day, they find the opposite trend the next day."

Once a contentious page plagued by trolls and opinionated users making unfounded claims, Clinton's Wikipedia entry has calmed down significantly.

"Back in 2007, there were more vandals, more troublemakers, more people trying to tilt the article one way or the other," Schilling said.

Now, Schilling claims, a slightly higher barrier of entry and automatic robots that flag suspect edits make the page a little easier to manage.

According to Schilling, Wikipedia pages generally become less contentious over time. So, while Clinton's page is "mature," other presidential candidate's pages are becoming virtual battlegrounds. Schilling said Carly Fiorina's page has seen a flurry of activity since her launch, primarily over how her tenure at CEO of Hewlett-Packard should be defined.

In fact, the biggest fight on Clinton's page isn't necessarily over the former Secretary of State's legacy. According to Schilling, the most significant spat on the page is over Clinton's name itself.

"There has been a huge argument over if the article title should get changed," Schilling said, from the current Hillary Rodham Clinton to just Hillary Clinton. "During last year's go-round, Jimmy Wales, the founder of Wikipedia, actually contacted her office to see what she prefers. ... She said Hillary Rodham Clinton."

Editing can be particularly difficult for pages with a political slant, with opinionated editors and political staffers attempting to change the page. In the wake of recent revelations that lawmakers and Capitol Hill staffers edited Wikipedia pages of high-level members of Congress, Schilling claims that many political operatives have been more careful about what kind of revisions they make.

Though he rarely sees staff edits on the pages he contributes to, Schilling said that it has happened. Schilling noted that when Vice President Joe Biden was a Senator, his office was a repeat offender.

"When I was working on the Joe Biden article, there was a case where it became known that some of his foreign policy supposed achievements had been put in by someone in his office," Schilling said.

Asked about why he does it, Schilling said that part of his motivation was readership.

"You get incredible visibility," Schilling said. "The words I've written, from this article and others, have been read by tens of millions of people."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Where else can you write where you get 2,000,000 readers?" Schilling said.

Schilling vowed he will keep editing through the election and into the foreseeable future, partially because he feels that he's already put in a lot of work. Last year, the software engineer achieved his goal of getting the page to "featured article" status, a level which denotes the highest level of quality a Wikipedia page can rise to.

"Even if I cut out other Wikipedia stuff, it'll be hard to walk away from this one," Schilling said. "I've got over 2,000 edits on the page over 10 years. That's a heavy personal investment."

Hillary Clinton's hypocritical bid to settle a grudge and smash free speech // NY Post // Post Editorial Board - May 15, 2015

Her fans may see it as a principled stand, but we suspect it's just Hillary Clinton holding another grudge against her critics.

According to The Washington Post, Clinton told a roomful of supporters (behind closed doors) that as president she would require her Supreme Court nominees to pledge in advance to overturn the 2010 Citizens United decision.

That's the case where the high court upheld the right of a conservative group to air its anti-Clinton documentary, "Hillary: The Movie," and run ads for it during the 2008 Democratic primaries.

The anti-free-speech McCain-Feingold law had banned such "independent expenditures"; the ruling essentially gutted that law. And the court made it plain that politicians can't limit independent political spending by any organization — not by Citizens United and other advocacy groups, not by labor unions, not by corporations.

It was a fervent defense of First Amendment free-speech rights, but Democrats have always denounced it as a supposed cave-in to Wall Street — which explains why announcing her litmus test reportedly won Clinton a huge ovation.

Of course, Hillary was already on record favoring a constitutional amendment to overturn Citizens United — even while aiming to raise an unprecedented $2 billion for her latest White House bid.

In other words, corporate special-interest money is evil — unless it's backing her ambitions or her family's pocket foundation.

As for Supreme Court litmus tests, they're a curious thing. The idea that a Republican might name only pro-life judges moves liberals to scream, "Fanatic!"

But progressives see their own litmus tests, whether for pro-choice judges or to overturn an unpopular Supreme Court decision, as clarion calls for justice.

Time was when liberals like Hillary Clinton were the fiercest defenders of the First Amendment. When it comes to Hillary and Citizens United, though, it's not free speech — it's personal.

Hillary Clinton's brothers could cause major problems for her presidential campaign // Business Insider //
Colin Campbell and Hunter Walker - May 16, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's two brothers, Tony and Hugh Rodham, could be a problem for her presidential campaign. Over the years, the pair has been at the center of multiple controversies for their business dealings and Republicans are already using them to attack Clinton.

One aide for a rival 2016 campaign told Business Insider that Clinton's brothers will definitely cause issues for her White House bid.

"Will they be a problem? Yes. They underscore everything that people fear and hate about the Clintons," the aide said. "They're essentially the id of Bill and Hillary Clinton. A bunch of money-grubbing and opportunistic hillbillies with no sense of ethics, decency, or even legality."

Indeed, while Hugh Rodham has yet to make headlines this cycle, last weekend, the New York Times published a story delving into Clinton's youngest brother, Tony Rodham. The paper reported he had repeatedly tried to profit from his connection to the former first family.

The newspaper pointed to a wide range of Tony Rodham's business activities including a Haitian gold mining venture and speeches he gave before Chinese investor conferences and a California cosmetics company.

"The connections to the Clintons have given Mr. Rodham, a self-described 'facilitator,' a unique appeal and a range of opportunities," The Times' Steve Eder wrote. "But his business dealings have often invited public scrutiny and uncomfortable questions for the Clintons."

Earlier this year, Tony Rodham was linked to alleged political favors in a report published by the Department of Homeland Security's investigator general. The report criticized a top DHS employee for appearing to go out of his way in 2010 and 2011 to assist "a politically connected regional center," where Tony was listed as the CEO.

The Times cited several other instances where Tony Rodham had tried to use his influence. After the devastating 2010 earthquake in Haiti, former President Bill Clinton helped lead the recovery commission. According to the paper, Tony pressured his brother-in-law for funds. Tony himself reportedly discussed the arrangement in court proceedings that "were the result of a lawsuit over unpaid legal bills filed by his lawyer in a child support case."

"I deal through the Clinton Foundation. That gets me in touch with the Haitian officials," Tony said. "I hound my brother-in-law, because it's his fund that we're going to get our money from. ... And he keeps telling me, 'Oh, it's going to happen tomorrow, tomorrow, tomorrow, tomorrow.' Well, tomorrow hasn't come yet."

Both Bill Clinton's office and the Clinton Foundation told The Times that they never helped Tony Rodham with the project, which ultimately never moved forward. However, it does appear Bill Clinton has been willing to help Rodham out with his finances. In the same court proceeding, Rodham reportedly discussed getting help landing a $72,000-a-year job at a company owned by now Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe (D), a longtime Clinton ally.

"I was complaining to my brother-in-law I didn't have any money. And he asked McAuliffe to give me a job," Rodham was quoted saying, adding that the job wasn't enough to pay his bills. "It's kind of like the job he got me a long time ago when I worked in the prison."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a phone conversation on Wednesday, Business Insider asked Tony Rodham whether he was concerned controversies about his various ventures could become an issue in his sister's campaign.

"I'm not going to talk about that," he said before hanging up.

Clinton campaign spokesman Nick Merrill sent a statement to Business Insider saying Clinton "loves" her brothers. While Merrill acknowledged Hugh and Tony Rodham have had their "ups and downs," he said it would be up to them to decide whether they want to address questions about their lives that could come up in the context of her White House bid.

"She loves her family more than anything. Her brothers have always been there for her, and she will always be there for them. Each though have their own lives, their own jobs, their own ups and downs. It is for them to decide how much of their private lives to share publicly in the context of their sister's campaign," Merrill said.

Still, Clinton's rivals are clearly willing to use her brothers against her. Republicans quickly pounced on The Times' story on Tony Rodham. The national GOP forwarded the article to reporters on Monday morning along with a statement attempting to link Tony to questions about Clinton's personal finances.

"The New York Times delves into Tony Rodham’s practice using the family name to secure controversial business deals as a 'facilitator,'" wrote Raj Shah, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee. "This comes amid scrutiny of Bill Clinton’s six-figure speaking fees, controversial foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation and other eyebrow raising money making endeavors to 'pay our bills.'"

And Tony Rodham isn't the only one of Clinton's siblings who could invite unwanted scrutiny during her White House bid.

Hugh Rodham, the middle sibling, was once described as the "the Billy Carter of the Clinton administration" for a pair of controversies caused by his business ventures.

In one instance, Hugh, who is often called "Hughie," accepted $400,000 in fees from two felons who were issued pardons by President Bill Clinton. The second issue involved a business venture Hugh and Tony were both reportedly involved in along with a Russian-backed political boss who was a rival to the US-allied government in Georgia. According to the New York Times, President Clinton's national security adviser asked the brothers to back out of this venture, which the paper described as having "caused trouble for US foreign policy."

Apart from his business dealings, Hugh's conduct during visits to the White House was allegedly unbecoming. According to "For Love of Politics," an account of the Clinton presidency written by author Sally Bedell Smith, Hugh Rodham treated the White House "like a dorm." Smith quoted Ann McCoy, a longtime friend of the Clinton's, describing Hugh's behavior.

"Hughie would show up in the worst outfits. ... He would be wearing shorts with golf balls on them and a T-shirt. He would sit in the Solarium, and Hillary wouldn't bat an eyelash. People would come all dressed up for dinner, and Hughie would waddle up in his shorts and fall asleep," McCoy was quoted saying.

Hugh Rodham has also tried his hand in the media. During the Clinton administration, he hosted a radio show. More recently, Hugh seems to have tried to revive his media career and some of what he had to say would be decidedly off message for the Clinton campaign. A promotion for an unspecified "radio program" that was posted on YouTube in 2012 features Hugh blasting President Barack Obama, who had Hillary Clinton in his Cabinet at the time. In the clip, Hugh discusses the 2012 election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The new radio program that you're about to listen to, which is on the internet streaming live will tell you, the voters, the unvarnished truth. Let me tell you what's the importance of this election. If you're unhappy with the no jobs policy the weak economy and all the rest of the things that the current administration provided you in the last four years and are unhappy with what the challengers have to say then we will try to get down to the nitty gritty of what's important and what's important is how you perceive your role as an American," he says.

During Bill Clinton's presidency, Hugh also attempted to launch his own political career by challenging former Republican Senator Connie Mack in Florida. Hugh lost that race and along the way he was reportedly accused of campaign finance violations and forced to admit he had a spotty voting record. The Orlando Sentinel quoted one anonymous "leading state Democrat" describing Hugh simply as "an embarrassment" for the party in Florida.

"We in the Florida party had nothing to do with him, wanted nothing to do with him," they said.

Hugh Rodham did not respond to a message Business Insider left at his Florida law office this week seeking comment on this story.

While the Rodham brothers would not speak to us, lawyer and political consultant Lanny Davis, a longtime Clinton family friend, sent us a comment on their behalf. Davis suggested there were inaccuracies in the various allegations leveled against the Rodhams over the years, but they don't want to defend themselves due to a desire to protect "their families privacy." Davis also expressed the brothers' wish that Clinton's rivals and members of the media will refrain from targeting her family.

"Tony and Hugh live their own lives, and while there are plenty of facts to dispute, they are not going to do so as part of a political charade," Davis said. "They hope this desire for privacy is understood by both the Republicans and the media, but either way they plan on vigorously guarding their family's privacy by not responding to purely political attacks on relatives who are neither public officials nor running for any office."

Michael Morell: Foreign governments have Hillary's email // Politico // Adam B. Lerner - May 15, 2015

Former Deputy CIA Director Michael Morell said that he believes some foreign intelligence agencies possess the contents of Hillary Clinton's private email server.

"I think that foreign intelligence services, the good ones, have everything on any unclassified network that the government uses," Morell said Friday in an interview on the Hugh Hewitt Show.

"I don't think that was a very good judgment," he added of Clinton's decision to use the private server for official State Department business. "I don't know who gave her that advice, but it was not good advice."

"She's paying a price for it now," Morell said of the server. "It was not good."

Morell appeared on the program to promote his new book, "The Great War of Our Time: The CIA's Fight Against Terrorism — From al Qa'ida to ISIS," which contains a passage on what happened in Benghazi before and after the attack that killed four Americans, including Ambassador Chris Stevens.

A version of the passage was published this week by POLITICO Magazine.

Allies Remember a Driven Hillary Rodham During '72 Texas Visit // Texas Tribune // Abby Livingston - May 16, 2015

WASHINGTON — As Garry Mauro drove up to Democratic presidential candidate George McGovern's Texas headquarters in October 1972, a young couple burst out of the office, begging for a ride to the Austin airport.

Mauro, who would serve as state land commissioner from 1983 to 1999, obliged, racing the tall, bushy-haired Democratic operative and the 24-year-old law student from West Sixth Street east to the Robert Mueller Airport.

"We gotta get to New Haven because we gotta register late for law school," Mauro, now 67, recalled Bill Clinton and Hillary Rodham saying.

It was a frantic moment that followed an impetuous decision by the Yale Law School students to come to Texas for a doomed political endeavor in the middle of their studies.

Thanks to several books — including the Clintons' own memoirs — their short few months in Texas have become a part of Austin lore. The couple worked on the failed Texas campaign for McGovern, a liberal U.S. senator from South Dakota. During their few months in Austin, San Antonio and elsewhere, Clinton and Rodham befriended several allies who would help Bill Clinton's political ascent in Arkansas and on to the White House. And as Hillary Clinton makes a second run for the White House, some of those bonds forged in Texas are poised to help again.

Bill Clinton arrived to Austin first as McGovern's Texas political point man, but Hillary Rodham was not far behind.

"Bill asked if I wanted to go too," she wrote in her memoir, Living History. "I did, but only if I had a specific job."

That job was registering black and Hispanic South Texas voters for the Democratic National Committee.

The campaign's challenge was insurmountable. McGovern's liberal policies repelled old Lyndon B. Johnson allies like John Connally, who led the "Democrats for Nixon" effort. Stricken by a state party at war with itself, McGovern ended up losing Texas in November by a two-to-one margin.

But ever since, the Clintons have had a personal connection to the state.

"Although Bill was the only person I knew when I got to Austin, Texas in August, I quickly made some of the best friends I've ever had," Hillary Clinton wrote in her memoir.

Clinton declined to be interviewed for this story. And many of the people who worked with her on the 1972 campaign have passed away. But there are still several who worked with her in Texas who remember the serious and driven law student.

"We Want a Real Lawyer"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sara Ehrman first laid eyes on Rodham in McGovern's San Antonio headquarters, a former nursing home.

A longtime Washington-based Democratic political operative, Ehrman led the campaign for South Texas. She and her team put up out an S.O.S. to Washington that they were in dire need of legal counsel.

What they got was a law student who looked more like an undergraduate, dressed in all brown: pants, shirt and glasses.

"This young woman looked 19 years old, and she came in and said she was a lawyer, and everybody started howling and saying we want a real lawyer," Ehrman said.

Even so, Ehrman, who was in her 50s, instantly formed a maternal bond with Rodham.

"We were not Texans," Ehrman, now 96, said of the connection. "We did not know all the intricacies of Texas politics, which were very complicated at the time."

Ehrman describes Rodham's brief stint at the San Antonio headquarters as "prepared, mature for her age, focused and in charge."

"We bonded," she added. "We just knew each other."

Rodham split her time between San Antonio and Austin, where Bill Clinton was based with writer Taylor Branch. Branch and Clinton ran the state campaign together and the three shared an apartment.

Eddie Bernice Johnson, who is now in her 12th term in Congress, worked closely with Bill Clinton on the 1972 campaign. But she recalled encountering the couple together just once during that time.

"I only saw them together one time, and then he treated her very gently, but I didn't really realize" they were dating, she said in an interview.

Besides Ehrman, one of Rodham's closest friends from the Texas experience was a University of Texas at Austin graduate named Betsey Wright.

Wright would often visit Barton Springs with Rodham, according to David Maraniss' book on Bill Clinton, First in His Class.

But she would have an exhilarating and rocky political future. She would later move to Arkansas and become a pivotal Clinton operative during his rise in state politics, serving as Bill Clinton's gubernatorial chief of staff and campaign manager in the 1980s. Many have said she was the inspiration for Kathy Bates' political enforcer character in the novel and movie Primary Colors, a roman à clef on the Clintons.

Bill Clinton called Wright "the Texan who had, by far, the greatest impact on my career."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Without Betsey Wright, I could not have become president," Bill Clinton later wrote in his memoir.

The Clintons, however, "cut her loose before they moved into the White House" according to The New York Times. She pleaded no contest in 2010 to charges that she attempted to smuggle contraband inside of a Doritos bag while on a 2009 visit to death row. Wright now lives in Arkansas, and in recent years she was a fellow for a state library system.

Wright did not respond to emailed questions for this story. But in 1992, she said in a New York Magazine interview that, like Mauro, she was impressed that the couple worked full time on a presidential campaign while simultaneously attending law school.

“I’d never been exposed to people like that before. I mean, they spent the whole semester in Texas, never attended a class —then went back to Yale and aced their finals,” she said.

Did Mauro ever see either one of them study?

“Christ, no,” he said.

A Lost Cause

Neither Rodham nor any of her colleagues were under the impression that they could deliver a Texas victory to the McGovern campaign.

“We all knew McGovern wasn’t going to win,” Mauro said in a recent interview with The Texas Tribune. “But historically, you just didn’t get less than 40 percent of the vote [in Texas] if you were a major party nominee.”

This was the first time 18-year-olds could vote in a presidential election, adding to Rodham’s challenge in registering South Texas voters. She also concentrated on Hispanic voters. Franklin Garcia, who died in 1984, was her guide in the region.

"Hispanics in South Texas were, understandably, wary of a blond girl from Chicago who didn’t speak a word of Spanish," Clinton wrote in Living History. "[Garcia] took me to places I never could have gone along and vouched for me to Mexican Americans who worried I might be from the immigration service or some other government agency."

Bill Clinton was often on the road, organizing events and hanging flyers in county courthouses.

But it was a lost cause.

“When the vote count came in, I’ll never forget walking out to the car,” Mauro said. “I ripped the McGovern bumper sticker off.”

The Nixon landslide did not surprise either Clinton, they would later write. Their circle of friends soon disbanded and scattered across the country. The couple made a trip to Mexico for vacation and then went back to New Haven for finals.

That Godforsaken Place

A year later, Rodham decamped in Erhman's Washington apartment in 1973 while working as a staffer on the House Judiciary Committee's impeachment inquiry into the Watergate scandal. Bill Clinton headed to Arkansas to begin his political career.

Branch occasionally saw Rodham during that year.

"I could tell she loved him, but she did not want to move to Arkansas," he said, noting her awareness of her legal work's place in history.

"I did notice some strain over that," he added. "Even at the time, I was pretty sure she would do it because her attachment to him was pretty evident."

But Rodham did go to Arkansas.

"When Hillary decided to go to Arkansas to marry Bill Clinton, I drove her down," Ehrman said. "And all the way down, for hundreds of miles, I kept saying, 'Are you crazy? Why are you going to that Godforsaken place where you can't even get French bread?'"

Ehrman said the conversation went in circles, and each time Hillary Rodham had the same answer: "But I love him ... and I'm going to be with him."

Over the next decades, the Clintons would return to Texas, both for delegates, campaign dollars and out of a sense of political loyalty.

Bill Clinton counts Mauro and Austin ad executives Roy Spence and Judy Trabulsi as the closest Texas friends who helped him through his presidential runs.

Mauro managed Bill Clinton's 1992 campaign for Texas, and Spence was a close media adviser to Hillary Clinton in her 2008 presidential campaign and is expected to hold similar influence this time around. Mauro does not have an official title with the campaign at this point, but he told the Tribune recently that he's working the phones on behalf of the couple.

Eddie Bernice Johnson, too, became a reliable Congressional and political ally, until she supported then-Sen. Barack Obama in the 2008 campaign. She immediately sided with Hillary Clinton in this presidential campaign.

Also while in Texas, the couple befriended donors like the late Bernard Rapoport of Waco, who would financially back both of their campaigns.

Texas helped deliver the Democratic nomination to Bill Clinton in 1992, and gave Hillary Clinton life support to continue her own campaign into the spring of 2008.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But also, they frequently returned to the state over the years to boost their old friends' own campaigns.

"All these people went in different directions and made a real difference," Mauro mused.

"We only got 32 percent of the vote," he added. "But...you look at all the people involved in that and what they went on to accomplish in their careers, it was probably an incubation, a seminal moment in Texas politics, if not national politics."

Clintons Earned $30 Million in 16 Months, Report Shows // NYT // Maggie Haberman and Steve Eder - May 15, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton and her husband made at least $30 million over the last 16 months, mainly from giving paid speeches to corporations, banks and other organizations, according to financial disclosure forms filed with federal elections officials on Friday.

The sum, which makes Mrs. Clinton among the wealthiest of the 2016 presidential candidates, could create challenges for the former secretary of state as she tries to cast herself as a champion of everyday Americans in an era of income inequality.

The $25 million in speaking fees since the beginning of last year continue a lucrative trend for the Clintons: They have now earned more than $125 million on the circuit since leaving the White House in 2001.

In addition, the report shows, Mrs. Clinton reported income exceeding $5 million from her memoir of her time as secretary of state, “Hard Choices.

The Clintons’ riches have already become a subject of political attacks, and her campaign has been eager to showcase Mrs. Clinton as a more down-to-earth figure. Her only declared Democratic opponent at this point, Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, is an avowed socialist, while Republicans like Senator Marco Rubio of Florida and Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin have considerably more modest means.

A major dimension of Mrs. Clinton’s candidacy is expected to be policy proposals to narrow the gap between the rich and poor and to address stagnant wages. Yet she is far from those problems; while she said she and President Clinton were “dead broke” when they left the White House in early 2001, they are now part of the American elite.

The report makes clear that Mrs. Clinton, since leaving the State Department, has joined the family speechmaking business with gusto. But the former president can still command higher fees than his wife, collecting about an average of about $250,000 per speech to $235,000 for Mrs. Clinton.

And while Mr. Clinton’s largest honorarium was the $500,000 he collected from the EAT Stockholm Food Forum in Sweden, his wife’s engagements topped out at $350,000.

Of Mrs. Clinton’s speeches, 10 were delivered to audiences outside the United States, but they were not nearly as far-flung as those by her husband over the years. Nine were to Canadian groups: the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce in Whistler, British Columbia; trade organizations in Montreal and Vancouver; the think tank Canada 2020, which generates socially progressive policy; and five organized by the events firm tinePublic Inc. The 10th speech was to a health care company audience in Mexico City.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton also spoke to a mix of corporations (GE, Cisco, Deutsche Bank), medical and pharmaceutical groups (the California Medical Association and the Pharmaceutical Care Management Association), and women's organizations like the Commercial Real Estate Women Network.

Mr. Clinton's speeches included a number of talks for financial firms, including Bank of America and UBS, as well as technology companies like Microsoft and Oracle.

The disclosure forms cover Jan. 1, 2014 to May 14 of this year. They show that even as his wife has begun her pursuit of the presidency, Mr. Clinton has shown no signs of slowing down: He gave three speeches in recent days, including one Thursday for the American Institute of Architects in Atlanta, and two on Tuesday in New York — one for Univision Management and one for Apollo Management Holdings.

The disclosure forms do not reveal what taxes the couple paid on their income, but a campaign official who requested anonymity said they had paid an effective tax rate of about 30 percent.

Mrs. Clinton's last filing, which covered her final years as secretary of state, disclosed more than $16 million in income. Most of the money, mainly covering 2012, stemmed from about 70 honorariums for President Clinton.

The Clintons have come under increasing scrutiny for their financial activities since she announced her run for president last month. Much of the attention has been focused on the Clinton Foundation and the donations it received from foreign entities during the time that she was secretary of state.

But the couple has also faced criticism for giving highly paid speeches to certain groups, particularly the financial industry.

The speaking circuit has enriched many well-known Washington figures and former presidents, but the exorbitant pay for light work can distance them from the realities most Americans experience at their jobs. In one case, the report shows, Mrs. Clinton received $100,000 for a speech to the California Medical Association — by satellite.

Bill and Hillary Clinton Earned Over $25 Million In Speaking Fees Since January 2014 // Vanity Fair // Melissa Locker - May 16, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton and former president Bill Clinton earned in excess of $25 million for delivering 104 speeches since the beginning of 2014, new financial filings revealed. A few calculations on a Scrooge MacDuck calculator reveal that is a lot of money to backstroke through, or, you know, use in a campaign for the presidency.

The financial revelations came when the Clintons filed required income statements from January 2014 onward with the Federal Election Commission on Friday, and reported by The Washington Post. The disclosure reveals that both Clintons have been working very, very hard on the speech circuit giving 104 paid speeches between them since January 2014. For those without a calculator handy, $25 million for 104 speeches breaks down to an average of over $240,000 per speech. Not all of the Clintons' speaking fees were reflected in the F.E.C. filing, though. Any lecture fees donated to the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation were not reported as they did not provide Clinton with personal income and, thus, were not required to be disclosed.

While Hillary Clinton has retired from the paid lecture circuit now that she is running for president, Bill Clinton is still putting in the miles, telling NBC News, "I gotta pay our bills." His hefty fees and busy work schedule can translate into substantial earnings—he took in $500,000 in one day by collecting $250,000 each for lectures at Univision and Apollo Management Holdings.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The filing also revealed that as the Clintons' political capital and experience grows, so do their speaking fees. During Clinton's 11 years as a U.S. senator and then as President Obama's secretary of state, according to The Washington Post, Bill Clinton made $105 million for 540 speeches, for an average of just (or rather "just") $194,444 per speech. In 2012, Hillary Clinton reported that her husband earned more than $16.3 million for 72 speeches, or an average of over $226,000 per speech. Still, good work if you can get it.

Of course Clinton was not the only presidential hopeful who filed with the F.E.C. on Friday. Republican candidate Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida filed his income statements and revealed much smaller holdings, including the fact that he cashed-out two of his retirement accounts worth between $60,000 and $195,000. Rubio and his wife also hold at least $450,000 in home mortgage debt. Republican candidates Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas and Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky sought 45-day extensions.

Hillary Clinton personally took money from companies that sought to influence her // Vox // Jonathan Allen - May 16, 2015

Almost a decade ago, as Hillary Clinton ran for re-election to the Senate on her way to seeking the presidency for the first time, the New York Times reported on her unusually close relationship with Corning, Inc., an upstate glass titan. Clinton advanced the company's interests, racking up a big assist by getting China to ease a trade barrier. And the firm's mostly Republican executives opened up their wallets for her campaign.

During Clinton's tenure as Secretary of State, Corning lobbied the department on a variety of trade issues, including the Trans-Pacific Partnership. The company has donated between $100,000 and $250,000 to her family's foundation. And, last July, when it was clear that Clinton would again seek the presidency in 2016, Corning coughed up a $225,500 honorarium for Clinton to speak.

In the laundry-whirl of stories about Clinton buck-raking, it might be easy for that last part to get lost in the wash. But it's the part that matters most. The $225,500 speaking fee didn't go to help disease-stricken kids in an impoverished village on some long-forgotten patch of the planet. Nor did it go to a campaign account. It went to Hillary Clinton. Personally.

The latest episode in the Clinton money saga is different than the others because it involves the clear, direct personal enrichment of Hillary Clinton, presidential candidate, by people who have a lot of money at stake in the outcome of government decisions. Her federally required financial disclosure was released to media late Friday, a time government officials and political candidates have long reserved for dumping news they hope will have a short shelf life.

Together, Hillary and Bill Clinton cleared $25 million on the lecture circuit over the last 16 months, according to a Hillary Clinton's personal financial disclosure required of presidential candidates. A lot of the focus will naturally go toward the political argument that Clinton's wealth makes her out of touch. The US has had plenty of good rich presidents and bad rich presidents. What's more important is whether they are able to listen to all of the various interests without being unduly influenced by any of them.

There's a reason government officials can't accept gifts: They tend to have a corrupting effect. True, Hillary Clinton wasn't a government official at the time the money was given. But it is very, very, very hard to see six-figure speaking fees paid by longtime political boosters with interests before the government — to a woman who has been running for president since the last time she lost — as anything but a gift.

Who gave and gave and gave and lobbied?

donating to the foundation. Qualcomm and salesforce.com did that, too. Irwin Jacobs, a founder of Qualcomm, and Marc Benioff, a founder of salesforce.com , also cut $25,000 checks to the now-defunct Ready for Hillary SuperPAC. Hillary Clinton spoke to their companies on the same day, October 14, 2014. She collected more than half a million dollars from them that day, adding to the $225,500 salesforce.com had paid her to speak eight months earlier.

And Microsoft, the American Institute of Architects, AT&T, SAP America, Oracle and Telefonica all paid Bill Clinton six-figure sums to speak as Hillary Clinton laid the groundwork for her presidential campaign.

And that list, which includes Clinton Foundation donors, is hardly the end of it. There's a solid set of companies and associations that had nothing to do with the foundation but lobbied State while Clinton was there and then paid for her to speak to them. Xerox, the Biotechnology Industry Organization, and the Institute of Scrap Recycling Industries, in addition to Corning, all lobbied Clinton's department on trade matters and then invited her to earn an easy check.

By this point, most Clinton allies wish they had a button so they didn't have to go to the trouble of rolling their eyes at each new Clinton money story. The knee-jerk eye-roll response to the latest disclosure will be that there's nothing new to see here. But there's something very important to see that is different than the past stories. This time, it's about Hillary Clinton having her pockets lined by the very people who seek to influence her. Not in some metaphorical sense. She's literally being paid by them.

That storyline should be no less shocking for the fact that it is no longer surprising. The skimpy fig leaf of timing, that the speeches were paid for when she was between government gigs, would leave Adam blushing. And while most Democrats will shrug it off — or at least pretend to — it's the kind of behavior voters should take into account when considering whether they want to give a candidate the unparalleled power of the presidency. It goes to the most important, hardest-to-predict characteristic in a president: judgment.

George Stephanopoulos Makes a Passive-Aggressive Non-Apology for Clinton Donation // The Daily Beast // Lloyd Grove - May 15, 2015

You see, Good Morning America host George Stephanopoulos was just too darned generous to poor kids and AIDS victims.

In a non-apology apology that is unlikely to appease the referees of press ethics, let alone his Republican detractors—and may just baffle morning television viewers who haven't paid attention to the blossoming scandal within the media-political complex—the former top aide to Bill and Hillary Clinton put the very best face possible on his lapse in judgment in not disclosing $75,000 in donations to the Clinton Foundation when he conducted a contentious April 26 interview with foundation critic Peter Schweizer on This Week With George Stephanopoulos, ABC News's Sunday show.

Although Stephanopoulos's case is very different from—and nowhere near as serious as—the embellishments of suspended NBC Nightly News anchor Brian Williams, his explanation of his mistake on Friday morning was much in the same vein as Williams's claim last February that he made up a story about a helicopter ride in Iraq simply in an innocent, good-hearted attempt to honor America's fighting men and women.

Willams wrapped himself in the flag; Stephanopoulos cloaked himself in charity.

His 48-second statement, which he read near the end of GMA's first block, went as follows: "Now I want to address an issue you may have seen about me. Over the last several years, I've made substantial donations to dozens of charities, including the Clinton Global Foundation. Those donations were a matter of public record, but I should have made additional disclosures on air when I covered the foundation, and I now believe that directing personal donations to that foundation was a mistake. Even though I made them strictly to support work done to stop the spread of AIDS, help children, and protect the environment in poor countries, I should have gone the extra mile to avoid even the appearance of a conflict. I apologize to all of you for failing to do that."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It is hard to argue that asking tough questions of a charity's critic on the air—as Stephanopoulos did last month with Schweizer, whose much-publicized book Clinton Cash has been the target of war room-level pushback from Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign—without bothering to mention that you've donated to that charity, is anything other than a serious breach of accepted journalistic standards. Or that letting viewers know about such a potential conflict of interest is "going the extra mile."

Apparently Stephanopoulos still fails to grasp that there is nothing "extra" about what should have been a common-sense disclosure. What's more, on GMA Friday morning, he didn't see fit to mention the sheer size of his donations; no doubt many of his viewers would consider $75,000 real money, even for a television personality reportedly making double-digit millions.

Even Stephanopoulos unwittingly acknowledged the bad appearance of things during an April 28 appearance on The Daily Show, two days after his Schweizer confrontation. He told Comedy Central's Jon Stewart: "I read the book that this is based on, Clinton Cash, and I actually interviewed the author on Sunday. This is a tough one, because when you actually look, look closely at it, he even says there is no evidence of any direct action taken on behalf of the donors. But everybody also knows when those donors give that money—and President Clinton or someone, they get a picture with him—there's a hope that it's going to lead to something. And that's what you have to be careful of."

When Stewart pointed out that "the entire system appears to be shrouded in that type of quid pro quo, or the appearance of it," Stephanopoulos agreed, saying: "Even if you don't get an action, what you get is access and you get the influence that comes with access and that's gotta shape the thinking of politicians. That's what's so pernicious about it."

Could Stephanopoulos, who is also ABC News's chief anchor and political correspondent, be hoping for access to and exclusives from Bill and Hillary, giving him a competitive edge during the 2016 presidential campaign?

It's a fair question. Even if Stephanopoulos never discussed his contributions to their foundation with the Clintons, as appears to be the case, the Clintons are undoubtedly aware of them. Like all successful politicians, they have a keen eye for, and a long memory of, people who give and don't give them money.

So if Stephanopoulos really wants to put this issue to rest—and I think he can—he's going to have to do better than the once-over-lightly treatment he accorded it Friday morning. A "modified limited hangout"—to use Nixon aide John Ehrlichman's phrase during the Watergate adventure—just won't do in this case.

Wolff: Stephanopoulos donation furor overdone // USA Today // Michael Wolff - May 15 2015

NEW YORK — Network news anchors used to be a powerful symbol of the modern age, of great events, of important men and women, of America itself. Now they are just the symbol of the media — an unpopular, suspect and intrusive presence in everybody's life.

NBC's Brian Williams fell victim to an anti-media backlash for having exaggerated his war reporting and other exploits. Now ABC's George Stephanopoulos is on the hot seat for having contributed to the Clinton Foundation.

In both instances — unintended breaches of professional decorum — the furor vastly outweighs the crime. Human error becomes high scandal. Personal lapses become an overarching and apparently devastating indictment of the fundamental corruption of modern media.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Stephanopoulos contributed, wisely or not, $75,000 to a charity focused on international health issues — one that is led by a former Democratic president whose wife is a presidential candidate herself.

Within 24 hours, the social media opprobrium and sturm und drang about Stephanopoulos — not so much a personal lapse as a technical infraction — pushed the story onto the front page of The New York Times.

Stephanopoulos is, of course, being held accountable for the Clintons, with whom, almost two decades ago, he had a high-profile White House position. Since then, he has not only publicly fallen out with the Clintons, but over the course of more than a decade, he has risen to the top of another profession.

Then again, that's part of the present argument. The media is not separate from politics, it is its insidious arm. And it is not just Stephanopoulos being held to account for the Clintons, but all the media, or at least, the liberal media. Indeed, this close-to-conspiracy-minded view about the liberal, or mainstream, media — a theoretical entity that can be defined as broadly as needed to make the argument — is the narrative of the conservative media.

With the greatest irony, and, one might guess, mirth, the conservative media has become much more politically influential than the liberal-ish media, in part by its constant and canny positioning as an outsider David to the big-media Goliath.

That's been the extraordinarily effective niche marketing tactic of the conservative media: ever-wounded virtue against the arrogance and superciliousness of the other side.

That prompts the most basic question: Why is non-conservative media (only defined as not being right-wing) so bad about defending and marketing itself? How come it lets itself be conservative media's patsy and fall guys?

Arguably, this is the result of its own marketing strategy. Almost everything about network news has become smaller — the money, the influence, the audience. And yet its pretense — a still profitable pretense — remains very much that it is the voice of the nation.

That's laughable and an easy sort of pomposity to puncture. Stephanopoulos is probably more knowledgeable about American political life than any television anchor has ever been, and yet he is made to play a remote television anchor instead of a sharp insider, a role that fools nobody.

Likewise, Williams, a talented television performer, is forced to imitate the mien and experience of Edward R. Murrow — here, too, fooling nobody.

In marketing terms, you can manage an aging brand for the profits it still produces or risk changing it up and losing those profits for an uncertain new future. Big media chose the former way for network news.

That emperor's-new-clothes position, pretending that it yet represents a great consensus, has not only made network news vulnerable to right-wing media, but has made it a prime target of the resentments of the broader liberal media, as well.

Liberal media — again, the definitions here is as broad as you like — is arguably now bifurcated into two classes. There is a bottom-heavy class of younger people more and more routed into digital media with significantly less earning power and with existentially uncertain futures, together with a remaining established set forced into ever-greater cost-cutting and the management of steady decline. And then there is a very small circle of people who, by some legerdemain, are able to pretend that nothing at all is different. Life is great. The future rich.

It would be impossible to ignore in both the Stephanopoulos and Williams cases the undertone of bitterness and something close to malevolence that has attached to them in the wide coverage of their particular contretemps. There is a deep hatred out there.

Stephanopoulos' contribution to the Clinton Foundation might create a perception issue for a journalist covering the race — although, reasonably, this puts the charity in his debt rather than the other way around. Perhaps something to weigh. But all of a sudden, it is the stuff of potentially career-ruining demonization. Indeed, the splitting of such ethical hairs is one of the leading stories of the day in the view of not merely the Internet but The New York Times, which also is constantly pilloried for the least deviation from some undefined standard of correctness.

The Times, like most other media outlets in high dudgeon over the Stephanopoulos contribution, does not seem to understand that this is not really a story about Stephanopoulos, but about the larger war against the media, mostly being fought by the media itself.

ABC News Disputes RNC Chair's Implication The Party Can Pick Its Own Debate Moderators // Huffington Post // Michael Calderone - May 15, 2015

NEW YORK -- ABC News pushed back Friday against Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus' claim that ABC News chief anchor George Stephanopoulos "was never going to moderate a Republican debate anyway," a suggestion that the party could prevent a television network from assigning the journalist of its choice.

"ABC News decides who moderates ABC News debates," a network spokeswoman said. "The GOP primary debate is nine months away. Before George recused himself, we hadn't made any decisions about our debate coverage team."

Stephanopoulos preemptively pulled himself out of ABC News' Republican primary debate in February following revelations that he donated $75,000 to the Clinton Foundation. Prior to the disclosure, the network's star anchor had notably conducted a grilling of Clinton Cash author Peter Schweizer regarding his accusations against the Clintons of corruption related to foreign donations, former President Bill Clinton's paid speaking appearances and Hillary Clinton's decisions as secretary of State.

Though Stephanopoulos donated to the Clinton Foundation to support charitable programs tackling AIDS and deforestation, the failure to disclose those donations while covering the recent Clinton controversy could tarnish a journalistic reputation he's been building since he left politics for ABC News in 1997.

In an interview Thursday on Fox News' "Hannity," Priebus said his concerns about Stephanopoulos moderating stemmed not from the donations, but rather the anchor's previous role as Bill Clinton's communications director during the 1992 election and his first term in the White House. "How can I, as chairman of the national party, have the former employee of the Clintons, who's running on the other side, be the person on the stage deposing our candidate?" Preibus said.

Fox News host Sean Hannity asked Priebus if he'd told ABC that Stephanopoulos shouldn't moderate the debate. "I've said it to everybody," Priebus replied.

Sean Spicer, the RNC's chief strategist and communications director, would not confirm that Priebus had previously expressed concerns about Stephanopoulos directly to ABC News. "We don't publicly discuss the private conversations that we have had with any of our debate partners," Spicer said in an email to The Huffington Post.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Spicer did not respond to questions about whether the RNC has the power to prevent a network debate sponsor from selecting the journalist of its choice.

Priebus has taken firmer control of the 2016 Republican debate process in hopes of avoiding the 20-debate circus of four years ago. In January, the RNC announced that it had sanctioned nine debates and threatened to discipline candidates who buck the party's rules. The RNC is insisting that TV networks partner with conservative media outlets at its debates, but Priebus' suggestion that the political party could overrule its network sponsor's choice of moderator implied a surprising degree of editorial control.

Stephanopoulos came under fire in 2012 for asking Republican candidate Mitt Romney about his views on banning birth control at a New Hampshire primary debate, a question some conservatives argued was out of bounds. Rand Paul, a Kentucky senator and 2016 candidate, once accused Stephanopoulos with colluding with Democrats in posing the question. A Paul spokesman told HuffPost on Thursday that Stephanopoulos should recuse himself from all political coverage with Clinton in the race.

Hannity brought up the contraceptives question during Thursday's interview with Priebus, asking the RNC chairman if he's going to "draw a line in the sand" to ensure that any "known liberals" won't be moderating Republican contests.

Preibus told Hannity that those who "could give a rip about our party ought not be the people moderating our debates."

Trump: Clintons 'kiss my a--' for donations // The Hill // Mark Hensch - May 15, 2015

The billionaire mogul Donald Trump says Bill and Hillary Clinton personally approached him about making donations to the Clinton Foundation.

“Both of them,” Trump said on Thursday evening when The Daily Mail asked if the Clintons had directly asked for contributions. He added that he wasn’t promised any favors.

“But they do kiss my ass,” he quipped.

Trump, who is considering a run for the White House in 2016, reportedly gave at least $100,000 to the Clinton Foundation.

Gifts to the foundation were thrust into the spotlight this week after ABC anchor George Stephanopoulos acknowledged giving $75,000 to the organization. Stephanopoulos did not disclose those contributions during a tense on-air interview with Peter Schweizer, the author of Clinton Cash, which questions whether donors who gave to the foundation tried to curry favor with Hillary Clinton while she was secretary of State.

Trump said he was not satisfied with some of the foundation’s recent activities.

“I wish they would spend the money more wisely. And certainly I wish they would not spend it on themselves,” he said, citing former President Clinton and his daughter Chelsea Clinton's recent visit to Africa.

"It's supposed to be for good causes, not for luxury airplane flights," he added.

Trump additionally argued his donations did not disqualify him from criticizing Hillary Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic nomination in 2016.

"Nobody has been tougher on her than I have," he said.

"I haven't given her money," he added. "I've given her foundation money to be used properly."

Trump said he plans on making a final decision on a White House run "in June."

Sharon Native Tapped As Clinton's Top Aide // The Vermont Standard // Katy Savage - May 15, 2015

Robby Mook is making an effort to stay out of the spotlight but that hasn't been easy.

As Hillary Clinton's campaign manager — and the first openly gay campaign manager of a major presidential candidate — the 35-year-old from Sharon has made national headlines. But Mook is quiet when it comes to talking about his success. His focus is on the candidate.

That's just "typical Robby" said Matt Dunne, a Hartland resident who knew Mook as a high school student. "He doesn't want to be the story. He's all about the candidate and getting the job done and his profile is irrelevant to him, which is why I think people trust him in the political world."

Some say his low profile is what makes him successful. Clinton's campaign is not about him, and it's also not about Clinton. The focus is on everyday Americans.

Clinton's campaign is being built on the grassroots level through the newly developed program. Staff from the campaign will soon go to all 50 states and work with Clinton supporters to organize meetings and engage volunteers.

Mook is humbled by his position, he said.

"Hillary has picked some of the best pros in the business to work around me on this campaign, and it's going to be a fun, rewarding campaign," said Mook in an email.

Mook joined former Gov. Howard Dean's 2004 campaign for president after graduating from Columbia University. He worked in the Wisconsin office and in the New Hampshire office as a deputy field director under Karen Hicks.

"He's like a dog with a bone," Hicks said. "He doesn't let anything drop off his plate and he's a very, very good organizer. He's just the right person to lead this campaign."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

His humility is perhaps what sets him apart from other campaign organization. It's earned his name prestige in the political sphere.

"He's not in it for himself," said Dean. "Washington campaign staff is in it for themselves, especially at that level. That's what happened in Hillary's campaign the last time."

Dean had lunch with Mook just the other week. He declined to reveal what they talked about, saying political advice is meant to be private.

Mook was already making a name for himself in politics as a teenager. As a freshman in high school, he worked on the campaign for Dunne, who was seeking re-election to a House seat in Vermont.

"He was intrigued by the political stuff I was doing and he asked to help," Dunne said.

Dunne was so impressed by Mook's skills and charm that the summer after his freshman year at Columbia University, he recommended Mook as the first paid staffer for the Democratic House Campaign — an organization that works to elect Democrats to the state House of Representatives.

Mook admitted to Dunne that he had no idea what he was doing, but Dunne saw a confidence in Mook that was rare to see for someone of his age. Mook laid out the architecture of the group that still exists today.

Mook was patient with older candidates who were new to fundraising, like John Murphy, a state representative from 1969-99.

"By the end of that John was successful and delighted with Robby," Dunne said. "That's a rare quality of someone of that age."

It wasn't long before superiors took notice.

Mook first worked with Clinton as a campaign director in Nevada, Indiana and Ohio in her 2008 bid for president. Clinton won all three of those states.

He managed Jeanne Shaheen's successful campaign for a United States Senate seat representing New Hampshire.

"Robby is what everyone looks for in a campaign manager: He's smart, energetic and focused and knows how to bring out the best in staff. Hillary Clinton made a great decision in bringing Robby on board for her 2016 campaign. His knowledge of New Hampshire will be invaluable as she campaigns in the first-in-the-nation primary," Shaheen said in an email.

Mook became the political director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in 2009. In the 2012 elections, he steered the Democrat's eight-seat gain.

He impressed others with his advanced team-building skills. People trusted him for his modesty. And he became known as a clever strategist.

“He had a way of motivating people to do what they didn’t think they had the energy to do,” said New York Rep. Steve Israel to Politco when talking about the gain in 2012. “That’s largely the result of the dual talents that he had. Some people think strategically. Some people think operationally. Robby’s strength was that he was able to think on both levels.”

In 2013 Politico named him one of the “50 Politicos to Watch.” That same year he was the campaign manager for Terry McAuliffe’s successful campaign for governor of Virginia.

Those in his home state aren’t surprised by his success.

“In some ways when he started off I was his mentor,” Dunne said. “I would say that it’s slipped a little bit. I look to him for political advice.”

Friends say he’s goofy and a little nerdy, but also extremely funny. People gravitate toward him because of his humor. It’s motivated candidates when they felt like giving up and has kept the moods in difficult situations positive.

“I’ve always tried to not take myself too seriously, which enables me to work better with my team,” Mook said.

The humor was first noticed at Hanover High School. He was an “imaginative” actor where he participated in several plays.

Bill Hammond, the then-drama director at Hanover High School, compared Mook’s acting style to Jim Carrey and Dick Van Dyke. He had a malleable face and body.

Hammond didn’t expect him to take up politics.

“Politics is a really important job in society but a lot of people use it for their personal gain. I have great confidence that Robby is in it because he really wants to make things better,” Hammond said.

Dunne, a graduate of Hanover High School, cast him in that play.

“He continues to have that wonderful sense of humor which I think is necessary when you’re involved in politics at the level he is,” Dunne said. “That’s probably what sets Robby apart as a strategist, is that he is not someone who seeks the limelight.”

His success started here.

“Vermont will always be a special place for me, it’s where I grew up and learned the ropes,” Mook said. “I think what I learned when I was working on the races in Vermont, was really how to build them from scratch.”

What a Presidential Candidate's Financial Disclosures Do, and Do Not, Reveal // Bloomberg // Richard Rubin - May 15, 2015

Presidential candidates are supposed to start disclosing their personal finances as soon as Friday. That doesn't mean the public will be getting a complete picture of their relative wealth.

Candidates report assets' value in ranges so broad that they can be virtually meaningless. Their homes, cars and federal retirement plans are generally off limits from public view. Nor are presidential contenders subject to rules that make members of Congress disclose stock transactions within 45 days and reveal who holds their mortgages. The deadline is flexible, too.

At least two 2016 presidential hopefuls—Rand Paul and Ted Cruz—who would otherwise have to file on Friday have already sought legally allowed extensions. Hillary Clinton plans to file by the end of Friday, but her campaign has not yet said whether it will make the document public before the government does. The Federal Election Commission has up until 30 days to process and release the paperwork.

"It offers a window into a candidate's financial holdings, but the window is not crystal clear," said Rob Kelner, a Republican attorney who specializes in election law at Covington & Burling LLP in Washington and who is advising potential presidential candidates.

The reporters, opposition researchers and transparency advocates who comb through the reports find them maddening. The rules are set by Congress, which of course has an interest in maintaining vagueness.

"The top-level thing we always try to glean is their net worth and there are definitely some problems with that," said Daniel Auble, a senior researcher at the Center for Responsive Politics. "They report everything in ranges, and the higher the value of the assets, the bigger that range is. So accuracy is a problem."

Others dismiss those complaints. Focusing on the difficulty of calculating net worth misses the point of requiring candidates to disclose information about their personal finances, says Gregory Walden, an attorney at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld LLP in Washington. He has assisted candidates, including Mitt Romney, with filing financial disclosure reports.

"It's not intended to be a net worth statement," he said. "It's intended to guard against conflicts and potential conflicts."

See you in September

Federal law requires presidential candidates to file disclosures within 30 days of announcing their candidacy, or on May 15, whichever is later. They can get two extensions of up to 45 days each, and the Federal Election Commission can take up to 30 days to release the filings. So it could be September before the candidates who declared first have to say anything publicly.

The rules require candidates to list their sources of income, transactions, liabilities and assets, all within broad ranges. They also must release information about their spouses and dependent children.

For people with many different assets, adding up all of those ranges can yield unhelpful results. For example, someone with holdings of $2 million in 10 stocks would report them all as $1 million to $5 million, meaning that the public would know only that the holdings were worth a total of $10 million to $50 million.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For example, Romney's individual retirement account—which was so big that it later prompted tax proposals from President Barack Obama—was worth $20.7 million to $101.6 million during the campaign. Jay Rockefeller, the former Democratic senator from West Virginia and descendant of what was once one of the country's wealthiest families, reported two trusts that each had more than $50 million in them, the highest possible category.

"You just have no idea."

Often, candidates and lawmakers don't provide much detailed information about obscure-looking holdings such as hedge fund or private-equity investments that aren't major-company stocks.

"It may be an accounting firm or a law firm," said Bill Allison, a senior fellow at the Sunlight Foundation. "It may be a car dealership. You have no idea."

Candidates don't always see it the same way, particularly those who haven't sought or held federal office before, Walden said.

"They're surprised at the granularity, the specificity of the request," Walden said. "Many of them can't see the public interest in disclosing certain things that they can't see being a potential conflict."

Even with the limitations, the forms can reveal financial relationships and maneuvers that can cause political difficulty for candidates and lawmakers.

For example, Hillary Clinton's forms as secretary of state showed that she had moved her New York home into a trust for estate planning purposes.

"Politically challenging"

"Many candidates find these forms to be politically challenging because the media and their opponents mine them for little toxic nuggets that can be used against the candidates," Kelner said. "Candidates' level of satisfaction with filling out a financial disclosure form is inversely related to their wealth."

Candidates of any wealth level aren't required to reveal any information about their personal property—boats, cars, jewelry, artwork, furniture—and they don't have to disclose their personal residences unless they generate income.

That's why Romney's financial disclosure forms didn't list any of the multiple homes that became an issue for him during his presidential campaigns in 2008 and 2012. Also, unlike members of Congress and the incumbent president, candidates don't have to disclose any detail about their mortgages.

"If someone has a beach bungalow in the Bahamas," Allison said, "the taxpayers won't know about that if they can claim it as a residence."

Income tax forms

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

More detailed glimpses into candidates' financial status come from income tax forms, which they may provide voluntarily. If past history is any guide, that will come much later in the course of the 2016 campaign.

There's no requirement for candidates or elected officeholders to make their tax filings public. However, it has been a long-standing annual tradition for presidents and vice presidents to release theirs. As a result, most serious candidates for the White House follow suit. Usually, however, this comes as late in the campaign as possible and only after a flurry of queries from reporters and challenges from opponents.

In 2008, Barack Obama released his tax returns in March and challenged the much wealthier Clinton to do the same, which she did. That pattern repeated itself on the Republican side in January 2012, when Newt Gingrich released his tax returns, helping prompt Romney to do the same.

Those tax documents don’t necessarily present a full picture of someone’s wealth, but they do provide more detailed information on decisions about charitable contributions, investment strategies and foreign holdings.

For now, the public is getting zero information about all of the people who are doing everything candidates do without actually saying they’re running for president (unless you count those who already have to file financial disclosure forms as sitting members of Congress).

Until they say the magic words, Scott Walker, Jeb Bush, Rick Santorum, Donald Trump and Chris Christie won’t have to disclose a thing, though some of them have released information in their current or previous jobs.

“The longer the wait, the more they can do kind of under the radar,” Allison said. “And that includes not disclosing their net worth and their assets.”

Martin O'Malley Tells Supporters He's Inclined to Run For President // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur - May 15, 2015

Martin O'Malley inched one step closer to mounting a long-shot presidential bid on Thursday night, telling supporters, friends, and former staff by phone that he's leaning toward running for the Democratic nomination.

"He said that he is inclined to run for president, and that if he does, needs the support of all his longtime friends and supporters," said a source who was on the call, but is not authorized to speak for O'Malley's potential campaign.

As Bloomberg and others have reported, O'Malley told his backers that he intends to make an announcement on May 30 in Baltimore, the city where he served as mayor for seven years.

If he does decide to make the race, O'Malley, a former two-term governor of Maryland, would be the second candidate running to the left of Hillary Clinton, who is dominating in Democratic polls. The other is Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, who launched his campaign last month.

O'Malley spoke of the "economic challenges" facing the country and touted his intent to "bring new leadership, progressive values, and record of getting results to attack these challenges," said the person on the Thursday call.

Martin O'Malley schedules presidential fundraiser for eve of his big announcement // Business Insider // Colin Campbell - May 15, 2015

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley (D), an expected 2016 presidential candidate, has an upcoming fundraiser signed "O'Malley for President."

Though the notice for the May 29 fundraiser, obtained by Business Insider on Friday, appears to reveal his plans. O'Malley spokeswoman Haley Morris denied that is the case.

"No," Morris said when asked if the fundraiser confirms O'Malley's intentions. "This is just what is required by FEC law as he makes a decision by May 30 announcement."

O'Malley aides have previously told The Washington Post that he intends to announce his decision whether or not to run on May 30 in Baltimore, Maryland. According to Politico, FEC rules require a candidate to officially file their 2016 paperwork within 15 days of conducting campaign activities.

The May 29 fundraiser is hosted by Martin Knott, a Baltimore-area businessman who has raised money for the former governor in the past. MSNBC reported that Knott is expected to become the O'Malley campaign's finance chair.

"This will be his first major event leading up to his announcement, and we need every single one of his friends there," Knott writes in the notice to potential donors. "I contributed the maximum of $2,700 today. I hope that you will join me in contributing what you can, regardless of if you are able to make it to my home."

The online invitation for O'Malley's announcement event also says it was "Paid for by O'Malley for President."

On May 29th, I will have the privilege of hosting Governor O'Malley's Presidential kick-off fundraiser in his hometown of Baltimore. We would be honored if you would join us.

O'Malley for President

As he prepares to launch, O'Malley faces a steep path to nomination // WaPo // John Wagner – May 16,2015

MANCHESTER, N.H. — As he moved through a diner here this past week, former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley was followed by a crush of reporters. But many breakfast patrons at Chez Vachon seemed to have little idea who he was.

One woman asked if O'Malley had been governor of South Carolina. Buck Mercier, of nearby Hooksett, struck up a conversation with the Democrat about hunting and gun regulations, nodding as O'Malley told him, "I'm for common sense, man."

"Nobody knows him," Mercier, a retired construction worker, told a group of reporters after O'Malley had moved on. But that's not all downside, he noted: "I don't think anybody can say anything bad about him."

O'Malley, who plans to formally launch his presidential bid May 30 in Baltimore, will start the race still largely unknown among voters, despite repeated visits to Iowa, New Hampshire and other early nominating states. He barely registers in polls that show Hillary Rodham Clinton as the overwhelming favorite to win the Democratic nomination, and she is expected to vastly outspend him.

And yet, some analysts and activists see a path for O'Malley — albeit narrow — to become a real factor in the race, especially if he performs well in Iowa, the first caucus state, and gains momentum going forward.

"Can he make it happen? I don't know," said Joe Trippi, a veteran Democratic strategist. "It's a long, tough mountain to climb, but he's in a position to make it happen."

O'Malley is offering himself as a progressive, forward-looking alternative to Clinton, staking out liberal positions on issues including trade and immigration.

His party credentials could be considered stronger than those of Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), a self-described socialist who launched his candidacy for the Democratic nomination last month, and of onetime Republican Lincoln D. Chafee, a former senator and governor from Rhode Island who is considering getting into the race. Former senator Jim Webb of Virginia is also looking at the contest.

“There are so few Democrats in the field that O’Malley might be able to emerge as Clinton’s chief challenger,” said Tom Henderson, the longtime chairman of the Polk County Democrats in Iowa.

“People want to look at the different candidates and then pick somebody,” Henderson said of Iowa, where Clinton finished third in 2008, disrupting an early sense of inevitability and opening the door for a young senator named Barack Obama.

Some powerful Democrats, including Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.), say it is farfetched to expect a similar scenario this cycle, after Clinton served as secretary of state and has been the focus of “draft Hillary” efforts.

“Right now, we have Hillary Clinton. And that’s it,” Reid told MSNBC on Friday. “There’s not another Barack Obama out there. There are no all-stars out there. She has a clear field, and I’m glad she does.”

Clinton’s recent embrace of some more liberal positions — including on immigration policy — could make it more difficult for O’Malley to run to her left. And the presence of Sanders in the race also could complicate O’Malley’s bid to get a foothold among progressives.

O’Malley “has got to be able to squeeze himself in there somewhere,” said Kathleen Sullivan, a former chairman of the New Hampshire Democratic Party who is supporting Clinton. “He must think he has a path if he’s going to run.”

O’Malley has appeared undaunted in recent days, securing office space in Baltimore for a campaign headquarters, launching fundraising efforts, and lining up his treasurer and finance chair.

Stung by criticism that his “zero-tolerance” policies years ago as mayor of Baltimore contributed to the unrest after the death of Freddie Gray in police custody, O’Malley has started to talk more in his public appearances about the challenges faced by cities.

On Wednesday, he told reporters that Obama and the Democrats in Congress did not do enough to help urban areas emerge from the 2008 recession, leaving “whole swaths of Americans, particularly in American cities . . . worse off than they were eight years ago.”

When O’Malley tries to plot a path to the nomination, he said he thinks about the 1984 presidential campaign of Gary Hart, where he was introduced to politics as a 20-year-old campaign worker.

Hart started out as a huge underdog against former vice president Walter Mondale. He exceeded expectations in Iowa, then won New Hampshire and gave Mondale a scare for the nomination as the race unfolded.

“Front-runners are inevitable right up until they’re not inevitable,” O’Malley said in a recent interview. “The unknown candidate today can become very, very well-known tomorrow.”

A Bloomberg-Saint Anselm poll this month showed that Clinton was the first choice of 62 percent of likely Democratic voters in New Hampshire. She was followed by Sanders with 18 percent, Vice President Biden — who hasn’t said he’s running — with 5 percent, O’Malley with 3 percent, and Chafee and Webb with 1 percent apiece.

Dan O'Neil, a Manchester alderman who led O'Malley around the diner here, said the coming months will be pivotal for O'Malley. His trips to New Hampshire over the past two years have focused on campaigning for local and state candidates, rather than selling himself.

"The political people know who he is," said O'Neil, who considers himself an O'Malley supporter. "Now he's got to get out and meet the voters. I think once people get a chance to meet him, they'll give him a strong look."

At a house party in Durham later that day, O'Malley gave a short talk in which he decried stagnant wages and the country's growing wealth gap. He called the Baltimore riots and subsequent state of emergency "one of the most heartbreaking weeks we've had in a long time."

When O'Malley started taking questions, a woman asked why she should consider him instead of Clinton.

"The 'distinct-from-Hillary' question," O'Malley quipped, to some laughter. He cited his executive experience as a mayor and governor and said he has "a track record of getting things done and being ahead of the curve."

"I see things in a way that are much more in tune with where our country is going," said O'Malley, who is 15 years younger than Clinton, "rather than with where our country has come from."

Wendy Alley, a former chairwoman of the Dover Democratic Committee, said she has become a fan of O'Malley after seeing him a few times but is having a hard time spreading the word.

"I keep talking him up, and some people are like, 'Who?' " Alley said. "There are almost two challenges for him: getting people to know him, and then getting people to realize he's the better choice."

Dick Harpootlian, a former Democratic Party chairman in South Carolina, another early nominating state, said he thinks that a strong challenger could make headway against Clinton, but he doesn't know whether O'Malley is that candidate.

"Hillary is running a humdrum campaign," said Harpootlian, adding that he'd like to see Biden run. "If O'Malley can step up the game on an emotional level and excite people, there's a path — but a very narrow path."

Presidential hopeful Martin O'Malley makes crucial Iowa hire // The Guardian // Ben Jacobs - May 15, 2015

Martin O'Malley is getting serious about challenging Hillary Clinton in Iowa.

While Clinton has already had more than 40 staffers on the ground since April in the state, which holds the first nominating contest in the Democratic primary, O'Malley has locked down one of Iowa's top Democratic operatives.

According to multiple Democratic sources, Joe O'Hern, a veteran field operative in the state, is slated to be the caucus director for the former Maryland governor in Iowa, a position which oversees voter contact. The Des Moines Register credited O'Hern with putting together "the largest field effort ever in a midterm election" for the Iowa Democratic party in 2014 and he also oversaw campaign efforts in the midwest for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in 2012.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The operative joins Jake Oeth, a Des Moines-based consultant who served as the political director on Bruce Braley's unsuccessful 2014 Senate campaign in Iowa. Oeth has been a consultant for O'Malley's political action committee since the beginning of the year and is slated to be state director should O'Malley run for the White House.

O'Malley has long been active in Iowa, sending 11 staffers to the state during the 2014 midterm elections and making repeated trips to campaign for Democratic candidates. As the Maryland Democrat gears up for an expected launch of his presidential campaign at the end of May, the hire of O'Hern represents his most decisive step towards building a robust campaign operation that could potentially pose a threat to Clinton.

Spokespeople for O'Malley's political action committee did not respond to multiple requests for comment.

After Boston bombings verdict, O'Malley reaffirms opposition to death penalty // WaPo // John Wagner - May 15, 2015

Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley, who is poised to launch a White House bid this month, reaffirmed his strong opposition to capital punishment Friday following a federal jury's decision to sentence to death one of those convicted for the Boston Marathon bombings.

The Democrat said in a statement that while he respects the verdict, he remains opposed to the death penalty as "a matter of principle and as a matter of policy."

"The death penalty is ineffective as a deterrent, and the appeals process is expensive and cruel to the surviving family members," O'Malley said. "Furthermore, the nations responsible for the vast majority of public executions include North Korea, Iran, Iraq, Yemen, China and the United States of America. Our country does not belong in that company."

Maryland abolished its death penalty in 2013 at O'Malley's urging. As governor, O'Malley, a practicing Catholic, spent several years lobbying state lawmakers on the issue before becoming successful.

A federal jury on Friday sentenced Dzhokhar Tsarnaev to death for his role in the Boston Marathon bombings two years ago after after deliberating for more than 14 hours.

O'Malley, who has been ramping up for a presidential bid, plans an announcement about his political future May 30 in Baltimore.

How Bernie Sanders won the talk radio primary // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – May 16, 2015

Bernie Sanders may be a long shot for the presidency, but on liberal talk radio, he’s already king.

The Vermont Independent senator has for years been a fixture on the airwaves and internet streams of left-wing political talk shows, building a national audience eager to enlist in his populist crusade against the 1%. So when Sanders declared his dark-horse presidential bid last month, the response from talk radio listeners was overwhelming — and nearly unanimous.

“For my audience, the core of the Democratic Party, it’s Bernie Sanders. There’s no question,” said Atlanta-based talker Mike Malloy. “It is very consistent. It is unwavering for Bernie Sanders. It’s consistent responses no matter where the calls are coming from.”

From local personalities to nationally syndicated and satellite radio heavy-hitters, interviews with nearly a dozen liberal talk radio hosts show Sanders is so far crushing the primary — at least when it comes to their medium.

“For my audience, the core of the Democratic Party, it’s Bernie Sanders. There’s no question.”

Talk radio host Mike Malloy

Few people understand the pulse of the hardcore activist base better than the radio hosts taking calls and emails from listeners every day. They say their audience views Hillary Clinton skeptically (but would vote for her in a general election), and that listeners know next to nothing about Martin O’Malley, Jim Webb, and Lincoln Chafee, who are also considering Democratic presidential bids.

For Sanders, meanwhile, conditions are perfect.

While perpetually overshadowed by its far more popular conservative counterpart, progressive talk nonetheless reaches at least 20 million devoted listeners on radio and the Internet, according to Michael Harrison, the editor and publisher of Talkers Magazine, an industry publication.

Political talk radio listeners of all stripes tend to be more politically engaged and ideologically extreme than average voters, and thus more likely to vote in primaries. And the nature of the medium, which costs little to produce and is free to consume, lends itself to anti-establishment voices like Sanders.

“The default environment of radio is populist, is grassroots, is close to the ground,” Harrison said. Lately, commercial radio has gone through its most corporate phase in history, but it’s trending back towards “independent and populist talk,” Harrison added.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Like other left-wing audiences, talk radio listeners are looking for an alternative to Clinton. Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren is also very popular here. “My audience is pretty much in the ‘anybody but Hillary’ camp,” said Iowa-based Ed Fallon, who has fielded many pro-Sanders calls.

But unlike some other corners of the progressive movement, Sanders has put down deep roots in talk radio. “My audience has known Bernie for a long time. He’s been very accessible on radio for years,” said New York-based syndicated host Sam Seder.

And as listeners have become increasingly convinced that Warren is not running for president, they’ve coalesced around Sanders.

“It has been 99% a love affair between Bernie Sanders and my audience,” said Boston-based radio host Jeff Santos, whose show can be heard in the presidential state of New Hampshire. “Since he’s announced, it’s been unanimous and incredibly impressive.”

Sanders’ most important relationship in liberal talk started in a living room in Montpelier, Vermont, after the 2003 invasion of Iraq. Thom Hartmann had just started broadcasting his show from there and booked Sanders, then the state’s congressman.

The lawmaker was such a hit with listeners that it was quickly decided he should have a regular guest slot. Dubbed “Brunch with Bernie,” Sanders essentially took over an hour of Hartmann’s show every Friday, expounding on the week’s news and taking calls.

“They’re over the moon for Bernie Sanders, they’re over the moon for Elizabeth Warren, but when you tell them they’re a narrow slice of America, they get really mad.”

Hartmann now hosts the top-rated progressive talk radio show in the country, and Sanders still does an hour of “Brunch with Bernie” every week, more than a decade later.

Some on Sanders’ staff have questioned this use of the senator’s time, but Sanders enjoys it too much stop, an aide said.

When the senator announced his presidential bid, Hartmann quickly offered his endorsement and his listeners were eager to enlist. “I haven’t had a dissenting or skeptical or cynical voice about Bernie’s candidacy since he announced,” Hartman said from his studio, now in Washington, D.C., near the Capitol.

Sanders is also close with host Bill Press, another top liberal talker based in Washington. Press, a former chairman of the California Democratic Party, hosted some early Sanders presidential brain trust meetings at his Capitol Hill home.

“As a talk radio host reaching the progressive base every day, I have never seen the level of all-out excitement that I’ve heard from viewers and listeners in the last couple days,” Press said shortly after Sanders announced his run.

For the activists who consume liberal talk radio, the fact that Sanders has probably joined more picket lines than any other of Congress is a major selling point.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The progressive radio audience is really excited to have Bernie Sanders in the race and feels he's one of them," said Ari Rabin-Havt, who hosts a morning show on Sirius/XM's liberal talk channel. "You hear it in nearly every call on the presidential race since his announcement."

That's not true for other challengers to Clinton. "Martin O'Malley isn't a known quantity to this audience at all. Jim Webb is not a known quantity," said Rabin-Havt, echoing other hosts. "This audience knows and likes Bernie."

This audience could be a valuable in a partisan primary, but even Sanders' biggest fans acknowledge he has little chance of winning the Democratic nomination — let alone the White House.

Still, they appreciate his ability to influence the debate. "I think the whole [disappointment with the] Obama presidency has sort of reoriented people to not be as focused on the intent or will of a specific candidate, but rather the different mechanisms to push them in a certain direction," Seder explained.

But Sanders' near-universal appeal among liberal talk listeners has made things awkward for hosts who approach 2016 more pragmatically.

Los Angeles-based syndicated host Norman Goldman, who thinks Sanders' appeal is too thin, has engaged in daily battles with callers since the senator announced.

"They react like a betrayed lover. They act like I've been cheating on them," he said. "They're over the moon for Bernie Sanders, they're over the moon for Elizabeth Warren, but when you tell them they're a narrow slice of America, they get really mad."

Fellow Los Angeles-based host Stephanie Miller, who supported Barack Obama over Clinton in 2008, is now with the former secretary of State. "I love Bernie Sanders, and I love all his ideas, I've had him on many times," she said, but Miller doesn't think he can win.

That alleged marginalization of Sanders has prompted some callers to threaten to stop listening to her to show. "Last time, I got called the Obama-loving Hillary-hater," Miller said. "Now I'm the Bernie Sanders-hating Hillary apologist."

When is a campaign not a campaign? When it's a Super Pac // The Guardian // Ben Jacobs – May 17, 2015

Jeb Bush, RNC Spring meeting

These days, presidential candidates are not just raising money for their own campaigns. They are also raising money for outside groups with generic sounding names like Priorities USA, Right to Rise and Our American Renewal.

These are Super Pacs (political action committees), affiliated with each outside campaign but nominally independent. In 2012, they were helpful appendages. This year, heading into 2016, they are becoming fully fledged substitutes for campaigns, taking over functions including opposition research, polling and even knocking on doors.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Super Pacs are just five years old. Like most developments in modern campaign finance law, they were created by accident through judicial decisions, not by legislation.

First, in 2010 the Citizens United supreme court decision struck down restrictions on independent expenditures in campaigns by nonprofits. Citizens United was followed the same year by a decision by the DC circuit court of appeals in a case called SpeechNOW, which said political groups that sought to make only independent expenditures could not be subject to federal campaign contribution limits.

These two decisions combined to create “super” versions of previously existing political action committees, that would make expenditures independently of the candidates they supported and thus could raise as much money as they wanted. In other words, one donor can fund an entire Super Pac.

In the 2012 Republican primary, Super Pacs were credited with keeping the campaigns of Newt Gingrich and Rick Santorum alive for months, extending the race into the spring.

In that race and the general election that followed, Super Pacs were primarily used to run television ads. American campaigns have long focused on saturating the airwaves with advertisements; Super Pacs provided a new vehicle to air even more commercials. Campaigns, however, still have major advantages over Super Pacs when it comes to buying television time.

Within 60 days of a general election or 45 days of a primary, political campaigns are entitled to something called “lowest unit rate”. It means that a political campaign gets the lowest rate a television station offers to any advertiser, and it is coupled with the requirement that stations give political campaigns “reasonable access” to run ads. Lowest unit rate also means TV stations cannot censor or restrict ads that federal campaigns seek to run.

None of these rules apply to Super Pacs. This means that they have to pay a much higher rate per ad and may find it more difficult to get their advertisements on television.

However, all such advantages for campaigns pale next to the fact that Super Pacs can raised unlimited money from an individual donor. Federal campaigns can only take $5,400 from any individual ($2,700 for a primary election and another $2,700 for a general election). So while campaigns can get more value for their money when spending on advertising, Super Pacs don’t have to worry too much about value.

And this year, they are not worrying too much about just running television ads.

A bipartisan matter

Ready for Hillary

The nascent campaign of Jeb Bush has been entirely headquartered out of an organization called Right to Rise. The group is on pace to raise more than $100m in May alone and is expected to be significantly better-funded than Bush’s inevitable presidential campaign.

Bush has also set up a connected nonprofit, Right to Rise Policy Solutions, which is serving as a parking place for campaign policy advisers until the former Florida governor announces his candidacy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Perhaps the most remarkable aspect of Right to Rise is that it is expected to be led by Bush's top political adviser, Mike Murphy. Because Super Pacs cannot coordinate with campaigns, this means that Bush will probably be unable to communicate with Murphy for the duration of the campaign.

While Bush has yet to declare his candidacy, Ted Cruz, who has announced his bid for the White House, has also bragged about the success of the four interrelated Super Pacs that are backing his campaign.

In a speech at the April meeting of the Republican Jewish Coalition in Las Vegas, the Texas senator boasted that a Super Pac supporting him had "raised $31m" in the first week of his campaign. "That's more money than any other Super Pac has raised ... in the history of politics" in a comparable period, he said.

Each of the four Super Pacs supporting Cruz is funded entirely by one major donor and devoted to one specific campaign task.

Nor are Republicans alone in such activity. Hillary Clinton, the clear Democratic frontrunner for 2016, is holding a number of fundraisers for one of her affiliated Super Pacs, Priorities USA. A separate group, Correct the Record, has spun off from the Democratic research Super Pac American Bridge, solely to do rapid response for Clinton.

Correct the Record insists it will be able to coordinate with the Clinton campaign, despite taking unlimited contributions, because it will not run any ads on her behalf.

Not all of this may end up being legal. But as Rick Hasen, an election law expert who teaches at University of California, Irvine, points out, even "if some of these things don't pass muster with the courts", such matters probably won't be resolved until after the 2016 election.

Furthermore, campaign finance may have changed dramatically by the time such legal issues are resolved.

"Nothing is permanent when it comes to campaign finance," said Hasen.

For now, though, the landscape is dominated by Super Pacs.

At Iowa dinner, Rand Paul hits Jeb Bush on Iraq as Lindsey Graham returns the favor // Politico // Eli Stokols - May 16, 2015

DES MOINES, Iowa — Sen. Rand Paul was alone among the 11 Republicans who spoke here at the Iowa Republican Party's Lincoln Day Dinner Saturday night in taking a shot at Jeb Bush over his comments last week about the Iraq War.

"We had a question this week that was asked to a certain candidate who used to be the governor of Florida who's running in the Republican primary," Paul said. "And the question was: Knowing what you know now do you think it was a good idea to topple Hussein, to begin the war in Iraq?"

Bush, of course, has spent the week backpeddling after initially telling Megyn Kelly in a Fox News interview that he would have authorized military force in Iraq even “knowing what we know now”; four days after the interview aired, Bush acknowledged that he would not, in hindsight, have made the same call as his brother did.

“He fumbled around, and I think he had four or five different questions on four or five different days. But one of his responses was a very defensive response: ‘Well, that’s hypothetical. What would that have to do with this election?’ I think the question has everything to do with this election.”

Paul then pivoted and turned his attacks on Hillary Clinton, the likely Democratic nominee, who he said needs to answer difficult questions herself.

“I’ve got a question for Hillary Clinton: Was it a good idea going to Libya? Was it a good idea to topple Gaddafi?” Paul said, referring to Libya’s former dictator. “It’s the same answer: No.”

Paul argued that the terrorist attack on the U.S. Embassy in Benghazi “should forever preclude” Hillary Clinton from holding higher office, before implicating Bush and the rest of his more hawkish rivals for a more bellicose approach to foreign policy.

“We ought to think before we act,” he said.

Taking the stage 10 minutes after Paul, Lindsey Graham went out of his way to defend Bush, blaming the unraveling of stability in Iraq on President Barack Obama, not George W. Bush.

Graham, who has made a habit of trolling the Kentucky senator, also mocked Paul’s focus on civil liberties, picking up on his statement that the federal government should still “call a lawyer” to get a warrant before arresting terrorists instead of illegally spying.

“I’m not going to call a judge,” said Graham. “I’m going to call a drone and kill you.”

Rick Perry to announce presidential run June 4 in Dallas // Trail Blazers Blog // Christy Hoppe - May 15, 2015

Former Gov. Rick Perry has chosen Dallas to officially declare his second run for the Republican presidential nomination in three weeks.

For months Perry has said that he would announce his decision in May or June. But his constant travel to the early contest states of Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Florida has left little doubt of his intentions.

Perry joins a burgeoning field of contenders, including fellow Texan Sen. Ted Cruz.

The announcement was made via the Twitter account of his wife, Anita.

Unlike four years ago, when he rushed into the contest after seeing he could raise quick money and was leading in polls, Perry enters this contest as an underdog.

He is polling in single digits, but again unlike his last run, he has spent more than a year in preparation. He has consulted weekly with conservative experts on foreign relations and economic policy. He has assembled advisers and campaign teams in the early states and has even taken tutoring in public speaking.

He has frequently acknowledged mistakes in his last run – entering while still ailing from recent back surgery and being under-prepared for the rigors and questions on the campaign trail.

In the 2016 contest, he will begin from behind, not only trying to push his message through the similar-sounding policies advanced by a large pack of candidates, but he also must erase memories of his previous debate flops and campaign stumbles.

Perry has been stressing that he is the only GOP candidate – save for potential rival South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham – who has served in the military.

He also has touted his executive experience as Texas governor for 14 years. But he has competition with that credential from top-tier contenders Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

He will also mostly certainly stress his economic record in Texas, which has led the nation in job creation. He underscores lawsuit limits, minimum regulations on businesses and low taxes for firing the state's economic engine, which has sputtered in recent months with the plunge in oil prices.

Sources predict that after his announcement, he will immediately resume campaigning in Iowa, where he will be this weekend and into next week.

He is joining most other GOP candidates at a forum on Saturday and then spending the next several days on a nine-day tour of small towns throughout the state.

Amtrak's biggest challenge: The Hudson River Tunnels, and Chris Christie // Yahoo // Jon Ward - May 15, 2015

The crash of Amtrak Train 188 on Tuesday, which killed at least eight passengers, jolted the East Coast and the nation and refocused attention on the state of the nation's infrastructure, which is crumbling.

While speed rather than infrastructure may have been the problem in Tuesday's crash, Amtrak does face a long-term infrastructure crisis 100 miles north of Philadelphia: what to do with the North River Tunnels, which house two century-old two-way tracks under the Hudson River in New York.

The tunnels — which serve around 20 New Jersey Transit and three to four Amtrak trains per hour during peak service times — are a key chokepoint for the entire Northeast Corridor. They are the entry point for Amtrak trains going into New York, and the exit for those leaving the city.

Amtrak CEO Joseph Boardman described the tunnels in February as "one of the most critical pieces of infrastructure in the New York Metro area — if not the nation."

The tunnels are inspected daily, and engineers would shut them down if a leak or structural compromise were discovered. No one is talking about a threat like imminent collapse. But they are aging and have come under increasing strain in recent years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The flooding of the tunnels in late October 2012 due to Hurricane Sandy put the integrity of the ancient tunnels up against a clock. Chlorides and sulfides from the seawater remain in the concrete, the embedded steel, the track and the electrical systems — all of which need to be replaced at some point in the next decade or two.

“The damage to the tunnel following Super Storm Sandy has changed the situation entirely. Instead of work being a long term goal, it is now an urgent necessity,” Amtrak said in a recent document.

No one knows exactly how long the North River Tunnels will remain operative, but Amtrak CEO Joseph Boardman said in 2014 that 20 years is the maximum amount of time the pair of two-way tunnels could continue running without one of them being shut down for major repair.

To shut down one of the tunnels would mean running all New Jersey Transit and Amtrak trains to the city through a single tunnel, which would cause a 75 percent reduction in service. Only six trains an hour would go through the tunnels then.

Amtrak and NJ Transit service would grind to a crawl, causing a massive displacement of commuters, who would overload subway, bus and ferry alternatives.

It would be an “economic catastrophe,” said Tom Wright, executive director of the Regional Plan Association.

“The economic impact of a single day of the Northeast Corridor being out is almost $100 million dollars on the economy,” said New York Mayor Bill DeBlasio this week.

The only way to avoid such a scenario is to build a new tunnel under the Hudson, divert much of the traffic to a pair of new two-way tracks that would go through the new tunnel, and then shut down one of the aging tracks to do a full renovation.

The biggest challenge to doing this is that politicians in New York, New Jersey and Washington have so far been unable to come together on a funding scheme to pay for what Amtrak is calling the Gateway Project, which they have estimated will cost $15 billion and take 10 to 15 years to complete.

“What’s shocking,” said Wright, “is it almost feels like they’re waiting for [a crisis] to happen.”

There is a twist to the story that involves a possible 2016 presidential contender: New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie. Because in fact, construction was underway on a new tunnel under the Hudson that was scheduled to be finished in 2018.

But Christie canceled the project.

In the fall of 2010, exactly a century after the North River Tunnels were opened, Christie, who had been elected in a heavily Democratic state the year prior, was in the midst of a budget fight, seeking to make up an $11 billion shortfall in a $29 billion budget.

Christie argued that New Jersey taxpayers could not — by themselves without any help from New York City or New York state — shoulder the cost overruns on the tunnel project, which he said would be $2 billion to $5 billion beyond the $8.7 billion price tag.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Christie diverted state money — along with funds from the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey — from the tunnel project to more immediate state transportation projects. That move helped Christie avoid raising the state's gas tax — which according to the Tax Foundation is the lowest in the nation at 14.5 cents a gallon — to replenish the transportation trust fund, and also averted toll hikes.

Democratic lawmakers who had fought to get funding for the tunnel project, known as Access to the Region's Core, or the ARC Tunnel, were furious.

"The governor has put politics before performance, and it is the people of New Jersey who will pay the high price," Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., said at the time.

Lautenberg blasted Christie's decision as "the biggest public policy blunder in New Jersey's history."

The issue has continued to dog Christie. Last August, while he was on vacation in California, Christie was sucked into a lengthy back and forth with New Jersey residents on Twitter angry over his cancellation of the ARC project.

"@GovChristie please ride to NYC and back to NJ on @NJTRANSIT for one week and then say this was a good idea," wrote a user named Evan using the handle @Martinoe71.

Christie defended his decision, referring to the ARC as "an ill-advised project" and said that he was working "on 2 alternatives: Amtrak Gateway tunnel and/or extension of the 7 train."

When one New Jersey resident said that Christie "knows the 7 extension is dead," the governor shot back, "The 7 extension is not dead."

Even Sen. Cory Booker, D-N.J., a sometime ally of Christie's, jumped into the thread to argue for more investment in rail.

The issue is still coming up during Christie's regular town hall meetings. At a town hall in Kenilworth, N.J., on March 31, a man asked the governor why he had canceled the ARC project.

Christie replied that it was being funded only by money from New Jersey, the federal government and the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey. Christie said that New York state and New York City refused to agree to share the burden of cost overruns.

"It was like a game of chicken, you know. They didn't think I'd cancel it. They didn't know me," Christie said.

Unlike in his Twitter spat last summer, however, Christie told the crowd that a tunnel under the Hudson was "a good idea."

"We need it," he said.

A week ago, a group of transportation experts convened a daylong meeting at the newly constructed One World

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trade Center in Manhattan to discuss the future of transportation under the Hudson River, calling it the Trans-Hudson Summit.

Peter Rogoff, the federal Department of Transportation's under secretary for policy, called on the political players in Albany, New York City and Trenton — New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo, New York Mayor Bill DeBlasio and Christie — to take action.

"We need to figure out if we're just going to wring our hands and watch the patient expire — going to that six trains an hour scenario — or whether we're all going to take the more difficult political steps necessary to actually address the challenge, rectify the problem," Rogoff said.

Rogoff made a pointed critique of Christie's decision to cancel the ARC project.

"We are determined to look forward, not backward. But in understanding the urgency we face today, we also have to recognize that we did lose a whole decade," he said.

"We need to take a look at who benefits, and who as a region should contribute," he said. "But we need to recognize that we need to get on with it. We don't have another decade to spend thinking about it and talking about it."

Inside Marco Rubio's stumble on immigration and what it says about his ability to lead // Yahoo News // Jon Ward and Andrew Romano - May 15, 2015

WASHINGTON, D.C., and MIAMI — On the afternoon of July 30, 2013, Marco Rubio walked onto the floor of the Senate to give another stem-winder — the latest in a season of feisty speeches.

"Is there an issue on which we are willing to do everything we can and lay it all on the line?" Rubio asked his fellow senators. "If it is not this one, which one is it?"

For months, the freshman from Florida had been one of the central figures in American politics. The previous November, Republican Mitt Romney had received only 27 percent of Latino support on his way to losing the election, and that same night the GOP pinned its hopes on Rubio, a 41-year-old Cuban-American who had served in Washington for less than two years.

Rubio accepted the challenge, and in early 2013 he took up the cause of immigration reform. In reality, he had little choice: It was the issue of the day and everybody was taking sides. Still, Rubio did more than just weigh in: He adopted a leadership role, and a position at odds with many in the base of his party, and by the end of June he had helped push a comprehensive reform bill through the Senate. Immigration reform became Rubio's signature issue; month after month he championed it, wooing both conservative talk radio and Spanish-language media and exhausting himself in the process.

As Rubio entered the Senate chamber, the deal was halfway home. The bill had shifted to the deeply conservative House, where the debate continued to rage.

But Rubio was not on the Senate floor to argue for immigration reform. Not today. In fact, now that tea party conservatives who had propelled him to office in 2010 had turned on him — radio personality Glenn Beck went so far as to call Rubio "a piece of garbage" — the senator had stopped talking about immigration almost completely. Instead, he had come to play second fiddle to another senator even newer to the chamber than he.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rubio had come to support Republican Texas Sen. Ted Cruz's quixotic quest to defund Obamacare.

After immigration reform passed the Senate, Rubio could have continued his crusade and worked to ensure that the House passed something as well. Instead, he decided to change the subject. In July, he sponsored legislation to outlaw abortion after 20 weeks of pregnancy; a few weeks later, he withdrew support for a gay judge whom he had previously supported.

Now, while Rubio criticized Obama from the lectern, Cruz — the tea party's latest darling — sat a couple of feet to his right, nodding and grinning. At one point, Rubio likened the Affordable Care Act to New Coke — a product that Coca-Cola was forced to recall in 1985 after only a few short months on the shelves.

"It was a disaster," Rubio said. "Everybody hated it. What did Coca-Cola do when New Coke began to flounder? They did not say, 'Well, we are just going to continue to make more of it.' They backed away from it."

Rubio wasn't referencing his decision to back away from immigration reform — but he might as well have been.

"[Coca-Cola] learned from their mistake, and they did not double down," he continued. "That is the way it is in the real world. That is the way it is in our lives."

Rubio had a point that day. Everybody backtracks. Repositioning is a fact of life, especially in politics.

But what Rubio did in 2013 seemed different. The problem wasn't that he shifted his focus or emphasis. The problem was that he ditched his own immigration-reform bill while it was winding its way through Congress — and started desperately trying to convince conservatives that he was still one of them instead.

In short, Rubio appeared to panic. "He just decided to run from it like a scalded dog," says one influential Republican consultant.

"It was not his finest hour," adds Alex Castellanos, a Cuban-born Republican consultant who is not supporting any one candidate in 2016.

The episode raised important questions about Rubio's leadership skills — questions that still linger nearly two years later, as the senator embarks on his first campaign for the Oval Office.

The presidency is a singular job; no prior experience can really prepare someone to lead the free world. But how a candidate operates under pressure has long been a key indicator of how he or she will respond to crisis as president.

When Wall Street collapsed in September 2008, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., were essentially tied in the polls. But then McCain announced that he wanted to “suspend” his campaign and delay the coming debate. He appeared to be flummoxed and indecisive. “It’s going to be part of the president’s job to be able to deal with more than one thing at once,” Obama said at the time — and voters eventually agreed.

On Aug. 5, 1981, Ronald Reagan fired 11,345 striking air-traffic controllers, setting the tone for the rest of his presidency and strengthening his hand in later talks with Mikhail Gorbachev, who was reportedly impressed. In 1960, John F. Kennedy helped get Martin Luther King Jr. released from jail; Richard Nixon refused to get involved. As the Democratic Party seemed to disintegrate in 1948, Harry Truman took risk after risk, supporting civil rights and railing against Congress on a 21,928-mile whistle-stop tour; his rival, Thomas Dewey, spoke in platitudes and rarely mentioned Truman’s name. The list goes on.

Immigration reform is as close as Rubio has come, so far, to a similar crisis.

No one doubts Rubio’s raw talent: his speaking ability, his intellect, his sense of humor, his telegenic and charismatic personality. But there are doubts about his readiness for the presidency.

Earlier this spring, McCain and Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., had a conversation with Rubio about his future.

A McCain aide said the conversation was about “keeping open the possibility of running for reelection while he runs for president.” Rubio, 43, has plenty of time to seek the presidency; by giving up his seat he will trigger an expensive battle that the GOP might very well lose.

But two sources, one who claimed to have firsthand knowledge of McCain and McConnell’s intentions, said the meeting was to discourage a presidential run.

Aides to McCain and McConnell both vehemently denied that was the case. “After having lots of people tell him not to run for president over the years, Sen. McCain would be the last person to tell somebody else not to run,” the McCain aide said.

McConnell spokesman Don Stewart said that “while [McConnell] has conversations with Sen. Rubio all the time, he did not tell him not to run for president.”

Because Rubio is such a political phenom, many political insiders who spoke with Yahoo News wondered how he got himself into such an uncomfortable position over immigration. The answer, according to multiple sources, is that there was a divide between Rubio’s advisers over whether he should wade into the comprehensive-reform debate, with his political team counseling against it and at least three of his policy advisers pushing him to participate. Rubio’s public reversals likely reflected that internal tug of war — a misstep that a steadier leader may have avoided.

“I think Marco had genuine good intentions,” says Ana Navarro, a Miami-based Republican strategist who is friends with Rubio but is supporting Jeb Bush in 2016. “There’s no doubt he put in a lot of time and risked political capital in his attempt. But it all went to hell and turned into a perfect political storm. He managed to antagonize everybody on both sides of the issue. It was a mess — and ultimately all for nothing.”

Rubio declined to be interviewed for this article. Asked by Yahoo News in the halls of the Capitol whether he had “panicked” in 2013 when he backed away from the immigration bill, he did not break stride and ignored the question. Today, Rubio says he couldn’t have saved immigration reform; in fact, he insists that his continued advocacy would only have hurt the bill’s chances in the House. He also argues that future attempts will have to begin with border security and proceed, piecemeal, from there.

Rubio could still have the last laugh. If elected, he may one day usher his own brand of immigration reform through Congress — and look, in retrospect, like a canny operator who knew when to fold and wait for a better opportunity.

But that's not how he looked, or acted, in the summer of 2013. Two Marco Rubios emerged over the course of that year. One was the bold leader who stuck his neck out on reform and tried to steer his party in a new direction. The other was the cowed follower who retreated into comfortable conservative talking points the minute things went south.

And so the central question of Rubio's candidacy is simple: If the senator from Florida wins the White House in 2016, which Rubio is America going to get?

For Marco Antonio Rubio, vacillating over immigration is nothing new.

As the son of working-class Cuban émigrés, Rubio has long been caught between two worlds on the issue. On the one hand, Cuban-Americans — especially older Cuban-Americans — tend to distinguish between Cuban exiles (who cannot return home) and other Latino immigrants (who technically can). Rubio was raised to believe in that distinction.

"Nothing against immigrants, but my parents are exiles," he said during his 2010 Senate campaign. "The exile experience is different from the immigrant experience. … Folks that are exiles are people that have lost their country … and would still be living there if not for some political reason."

And yet, at the same time, the Cuban-Americans Rubio grew up with in the tight-knit urban enclave of West Miami were a lot like the rest of America's Latino immigrants. As a boy, he experienced bigotry firsthand. "You're a bunch of Cubans," someone shouted at his family during the 1980 Mariel boatlift. "Why don't you go back home?" His parents both struggled to make ends meet in the service industry. For decades his dad toiled away tending bar in South Beach hotels; his mother slaved away as a maid until she retired in her 70s. They were surrounded by people who faced similar challenges — and Rubio continues to be today, because he still lives in West Miami.

"Virtually everyone is Hispanic and virtually all of my neighbors came from somewhere else not that long ago," Rubio said in 2012. "You know them not as a statistic, you know them as a human being — a walking, talking person who is in pain and who came here because they were hungry and their kids were starving and their family was, you know, hurting. … They did what they had to do to provide for them."

Rubio's mixed feelings about immigration — his deep-seated faith in the special status of Cuban-Americans offset by his visceral empathy for the broader immigrant experience — have shaped his politics since the start of his career. Immigration reform is treacherous terrain, especially for a rising Latino American star — and every time the ground has shifted, Rubio, sensing both the promise and the peril ahead, has adjusted his positioning in response.

By some estimates, more than three-quarters of the 200,000 men and women who work Florida's farms and fields are undocumented immigrants. For years, the Sunshine State's heavily Republican legislature has blocked any proposal to help these workers. But when Rubio arrived in the House in 2000, he surprised farmworker activists by siding against his fellow Republicans — and their backers in agribusiness.

"Rubio got it right away," says Greg Schell, the managing attorney for the Migrant Farmworker Justice Project, who at the time was pushing for a "radical" piece of legislation that would guarantee workers a minimum number of hours per week regardless of weather or crop conditions. "We met with him and explained it to him and he said,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

'Gee, that sounds totally fair.' He wasn't put off by the fact that it hadn't been done anywhere else. So our initial response was, 'Gosh, this guy might be a champion of workers — even though he's a Republican.'"

For a time, Rubio was that champion. With Frank Peterman, a liberal African-American Democrat from St. Petersburg, the young legislator went on to co-sponsor a bill that would have banned labor contractors from withholding the cost of tools and transportation from workers' salaries, and another that would have granted workers the right to sue contractors who didn't pay the minimum wage. (Neither passed.) Rubio was also in favor of providing resident tuition discounts to the children of undocumented immigrants who had lived in Florida for at least three consecutive years before graduating from high school. Many of his constituents back in West Miami would have benefited from these proposals.

By the time he became House speaker in 2007, Rubio was no longer actively campaigning for in-state tuition breaks or farmworkers' rights. But he still found a way to help the immigrant cause. As the Washington Post's Manuel Roig-Franzia reported in "The Rise of Marco Rubio," GOP lawmakers in Tallahassee were pressuring the new speaker to make immigration enforcement part of his agenda — but "Marco did not want anything to do with it," according to one of his advisers. Instead, he decided to bury six immigration measures in what Roig-Franzia describes as "the legislative equivalent of the basement." By preventing them from coming up for debate, Rubio kept Florida from adopting the kind of draconian laws that would later cause controversy in Arizona and Alabama.

That kind of ferocious debate wasn't good for the state, Rubio reasoned — and it wouldn't have been good for its most promising Latino Republican, either. "We didn't do anything on immigration at all during those two years," says J.C. Planas, a fellow Cuban-American Republican from Miami who was one of Rubio's early allies in the House but later broke with him during an internal leadership battle. "The speaker didn't let those immigration bills come to the floor because it wouldn't have helped him." In this case, Rubio's political interests aligned with the interests of Florida's undocumented immigrants.

That calculus changed, however, when he decided to challenge incumbent Republican Gov. Charlie Crist for the party's 2010 U.S. Senate nomination. Initially a long shot — a February 2009 Quinnipiac poll measured Crist's support at 53 percent to the speaker's measly 3 percent — Rubio began to gain momentum later that year by running to the governor's right and captivating the nascent tea party movement.

His rhetoric on immigration shifted accordingly. On the campaign trail, Rubio began to use the loaded phrase "illegal aliens." He initially said that SB 1070, a bill that would allow authorities to stop people and demand their immigration papers, would transform Arizona into a "police state" — then he changed his mind and told a conservative magazine that he would have voted for it. He championed a controversial electronic verification system designed to help employers determine the legal status of potential hires. He curried favor with tea partyers by arguing that the DREAM Act, which would have provided a path to citizenship for immigrants who were illegally brought to the U.S. as children, would have contributed to a "broader effort to grant blanket amnesty." He also described "an earned path to citizenship" as "code for amnesty." And he went on to abandon his earlier support for tuition breaks for the children of undocumented immigrants. "We're a nation of laws," Rubio declared at the time. "If you're here in violation of the laws, you shouldn't benefit from these programs."

By the time Rubio defeated Crist, those who had worked with him in Florida were beginning to wonder what — if anything — he stood for.

"His tone has changed on the subject," said state Rep. Juan Zapata, another Miami Republican. "And to me it's very obvious that it's for political reasons."

"You can't be a leader if you can't tell your friends they're wrong," adds Planas today. "Sure, there's always a certain amount you have to bend. That's politics. But, ultimately, I've never really seen Marco take on his friends publicly before, and that is troubling. I think he's still finding his way."

Rubio would continue to find his way once he arrived in Washington. As the tea party passions of 2010 began to die down, and as the 2012 presidential contest began to heat up, the landscape shifted yet again. If Mitt Romney wanted to displace President Obama, the thinking went, he would have to improve the GOP's dismal performance among Latino voters. And if Romney couldn't do it, perhaps the party's next nominee could. Rubio was mentioned as both a possible running mate and a possible successor.

And so Rubio began to drift back toward the center. In January 2012, when two young men held up a sign reading "Latino or Tea-Partino?" during one of the senator's speeches, he told the crowd, "I'm not who they think I am. I don't stand for what they claim I stand for." A few months later, Rubio revealed that he was developing his own version of the DREAM Act. "If you were 4 years old when you were brought here … and have much to contribute to our future, I think most Americans, the vast majority of Americans, find that compelling and want to accommodate that," he said at the time.

In April, Rubio met with Rep. Luis Gutierrez, D-Ill., the House's top immigration-reform advocate, to discuss the details of his plan. Gutierrez was pleasantly surprised. "Here he was, a guy who had ridden the tea party wave into Washington and described the DREAM Act as amnesty," Gutierrez told Yahoo News. "And now he wanted to take on the nativist voices in his own party. Whenever a Republican raises his hand and says, 'Hey, I want to do something for immigrants,' I jump for joy. 'Let's get it done.'"

The biggest shift, however, came at the end of 2012, when Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., approached Rubio in the Senate gym to ask if he was interested in collaborating on comprehensive immigration reform — and Rubio, who had previously insisted that "the best way to address immigration issues is sequentially," didn't say no. "[I want to] tie a pathway to citizenship to border security and enforcement," Rubio told Durbin and his colleagues, according to a report by the New Yorker's Ryan Lizza. "If you think that the Gang [of Eight] can put something together that's consistent with these principles, then I'll work with you. Otherwise, I'm not going to waste your time." Initially, Democrats viewed the pathway and border security as separate issues. But they quickly agreed to connect them — and for the first time, Rubio agreed to consider a pathway to citizenship.

Thus began Rubio's alliance with the so-called Gang of Eight.

"The politics of this have been turned upside down," said New York Sen. Chuck Schumer at the Gang's initial press conference on Jan. 28, 2013. "For the first time ever there is more political risk in opposing immigration reform than supporting it."

"There are 11 million human beings that are undocumented," Rubio added. "We have an obligation and a need to address the situation."

For the next six months, Rubio was, as one Senate aide told Lizza, "the cool jock and the captain of the football team" — the guy with whom "everyone wanted to hang out" but who still managed to remain a little aloof. In order to preserve his conservative credibility and prevent right-wing Republicans from torpedoing the deal, Rubio repeatedly distanced himself from the Gang over hot-button issues, opposing union demands and supporting biometric tracking for visa holders. But he also served as the group's official ambassador to the right — "the linchpin on the Republican side," as Arizona Sen. Jeff Flake, one of Rubio's fellow GOP Gang members, put it.

Despite Rubio's cautious maneuvering, the Democrats couldn't have been more grateful. "He has been invaluable," Durbin told Lizza in mid-2013. "He's willing to go on the most conservative talk shows, television and radio, Rush Limbaugh and the rest. They respect him, they like him, they think he may have a future in the party."

"He's the real deal," added Schumer. "He is smart, he is substantive. He knows when to compromise and when to hold. And he's personable."

Even McCain, who initially grumbled about having to share the GOP spotlight with the junior Floridian, offered some qualified praise for Rubio's communication skills. "Look, I'm very proud of myself, OK?" McCain said. "But he articulates [the need for reform] better than anybody I know."

McCain was right. In April, Rubio insisted that "leaving things the way they are" would be "the real amnesty." A month and a half later, he told conservative radio host Hugh Hewitt that the "secure the borders" crowd had it wrong. "They want to see the enforcement first and then the legalization afterward," Rubio said. "And that was initially how I thought about the issue as well. The problem with that is, what do we do in the meantime?"

But then, on June 27, 2013, the bill passed the Senate — and Rubio began to run away. Two polls showed double-digit drops in his net favorability rating among Republicans. Conservative pundits were pouncing. Spurred on by the Heritage Foundation's Robert Rector and Rep. Steve King, R-Iowa, tea party activists booed Rubio lustily at a rally outside the Capitol.

"I remember the hostility — my God, it was there," says Brent Bozell, founder of the Media Research Center and president of For America, a conservative political advocacy group. "I traveled around the country on the defund battle and I would talk to people, and they were not happy with him."

And that's when Rubio seemed to lose his nerve. When he went home to Florida for August recess, he mentioned immigration only when asked about it by constituents or reporters. Otherwise he avoided the topic. "Politically, it has not been a pleasant experience, to say the least," he told one audience.

By the fall, Rubio had gone from ignoring his own bill to repudiating it. "The House is just not going to jump on board for whatever the Senate passes," he told the Tampa Bay Times in October. On CNN he was even more dismissive, referring to the Senate proposal as a purely partisan bill — calling it something "the Democrats in the Senate are demanding" — as if he and his fellow Republicans had never supported it.

The shift was startling. "In 2013, Rubio came on board," says Gutierrez. "He was enthusiastic. He hired wonderful staff. He added experts. I met with him for over an hour — just he and I and his staff. He was extremely generous with his time and very devoted to putting together the kind of team that would lead us to a bill. But then, after it passed, he suddenly said, 'I'm not for that.'"

Rubio's official position is that once immigration passed the Senate, the matter was out of his hands; any attempt to influence the House would have been counterproductive.

"After the Senate passed the bill, the Senate was done with its work," says Russell Moore, head of the Southern Baptist Convention's Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission, who worked closely with Rubio's office on immigration reform. "Rubio knows that doing what [South Carolina Republican Sen.] Lindsey Graham did and lecturing the House is not going to get it passed. He did his job and then moved on."

Others, including some who have worked for Rubio in the past, say that Democrats like Schumer negotiated an agreement in the Senate that they knew would anger conservatives in the House, because they — and the White House — ultimately didn't want a bill to pass.

"They didn't want to give him that win," one former Rubio aide insists. "They saw the writing on the wall in terms of what it would do in 2016."

Looking back, it's easy to think immigration reform was always doomed. Conservative distrust ran deep; many Republicans believed that even if the House passed a palatable bill, it would be changed and corrupted when combined with the Senate version.

Yet, even as Rubio fled the scene, comprehensive reform appeared to have a shot. Conservative groups tied to Karl Rove ran television ads thanking Rubio for his work. The Koch brothers' political organization, Americans for Prosperity, decided to hold its annual conference in Florida, and even awarded Rubio a prime speaking slot, a clear attempt by the pro-reform group to bolster him.

For months, a bipartisan group in the House had been locked in negotiations; a deal was close. The House Judiciary Committee had passed four separate pieces of immigration legislation. There was ongoing discussion about giving undocumented immigrants a path to legal status rather than citizenship — a discussion that remains a central part of the debate among Republicans to this day.

"I think we're going to get to conference and I think we're going to pass something ultimately," Florida Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart, a lead Republican negotiator in the House, said at the time. "I'm frankly still very optimistic. I've never thought that this was going to be an easy process."

Advocates say that Rubio could have kept a respectful distance from the House negotiations while continuing to tout the virtues of immigration reform in the press.

"He allowed a wonderful opportunity pass to illustrate that he's got the chops to bring people together," argues Javier Palomarez, president of the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce. "That, to me, is not a very smart move at all: After you've put your name on it, you've put all this work, to just let it sit out there and walk away."

According to a source inside the House negotiations, Rubio's actions hurt their momentum. So why did he change course, effectively making his own bill's uphill battle even more difficult than it already was?

Of all the 2016 candidates, Rubio has the most devoted and tight-knit kitchen cabinet. So far, they have managed to prevent any leaks about what took place within their ranks during the summer of 2013.

But Yahoo News has uncovered some clues about the internal struggles that led to the biggest stumble of Rubio's career.

None of the three paid staffers most intimately involved with Rubio's immigration reform efforts — including his then chief of staff — still work for him today.

Close observers of Rubio World say the senator's team was sharply divided for much of 2013 about the wisdom of pursuing immigration reform. On one side of the debate were his political advisers, who ranged from uneasy to unhappy: veteran operative Terry Sullivan (who moved that year to work full time on Rubio's PAC and is now his campaign manager), plus his outside consultants Todd Harris, Heath Thompson and Malorie Thompson.

Communications director Alex Conant and longtime aide Alberto Martinez, who is now Rubio's chief of staff, were generally neutral.

At the same time, three of Rubio's policy-minded staffers were heavily invested in working toward a deal: then chief of staff Cesar Conda, legislative director Sally Canfield and an aide named John Baselice.

Rubio's pullback from immigration after it passed the Senate is attributed to his political advisers, who many think never wanted him out front on the issue to begin with, and who declined to speak about their private consultations with him.

The sharp divide among Rubio's advisers — and the subsequent departure of those pushing for immigration reform — helps to explain why he seemed to be flailing in the summer of 2013. That kind of snapback — the senator's sudden abandonment of his own signature legislation — is what happens when there are two competing groups in a politician's camp, each pulling equally hard in opposite directions, and one of the groups loses its grip.

Over the next year, Conda drifted away from Rubio's orbit; Sullivan took his place as the senator's point person. In April 2014, Conda resigned from Rubio's Senate staff to work for the senator's political action committee, Reclaim America — a normal step for an adviser who is gearing up for a presidential campaign. But then, in November, Conda quit the PAC to go into private practice. He is said to still be in touch with Rubio, but his influence is nothing like it once was.

When asked over email if he could describe the debate inside Rubio World in 2013, Conda responded tersely, "You'll have to chat with Conant."

Conant said he would not discuss "personnel matters," but said any linkage between immigration reform's demise and the departures of Rubio's key policy staffers was "silly." They "left the government after years of great service for awesome private-sector jobs."

Canfield and Baselice both departed in 2014 as well. Canfield, who was with Rubio until the end of the year, now serves in a senior position at a pharmaceutical company called AbbVie. Baselice left in July 2014 and now works at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Like Conda, neither would agree to talk about what happened in 2013.

It's not hard to see how a more seasoned leader than Rubio could have managed the immigration fallout better. He might not have been so swayed by his advisers' conflicting opinions; he might have stood firm on principle, even after his poll numbers began to crater; he might have avoided the kind of transparent pandering that alienates friend and foe alike.

But as Rubio kicks off his presidential campaign, there are signs that he has learned the lessons of 2013 and emerged as a stronger candidate because of them. According to a veteran Republican consultant who has worked with Rubio's team, the senator was upset, in retrospect, that his political advisers had yanked him back from immigration reform — and he decided to empower his policy people as a result. He went on to spend all of 2014 delving into the minutiae of taxes and foreign affairs. Even here, political considerations seemed to be in the mix — Rubio's pivot from foreign policy moderate to uber-hawk, though plausible, has been jarring. Nonetheless, Rubio gave a series of serious-minded speeches that rebuilt his reputation as a man of substance, and penned a book that the New Republic called "chock full of policy ideas" when it was released in January.

“He’s better today than he was a few years ago,” argues Castellanos. “You can just feel it. These guys go to the Super Bowl, and the first time they get into the bright lights, they choke. Rubio was marked by the searing fire of defeat. I think he has grown up and gotten better for it.

“If he’s still the same guy,” Castellanos adds, “he’s in trouble.”

Rubio’s position on immigration reform hasn’t changed since the end of 2013; whenever he’s asked, he insists that the only realistic way to reform the system is to start with border security. His standing on the issue seems to have stabilized as a result.

“Even [Republicans] who disagree with Rubio on immigration reform — many of whom I’m hearing from now — are warming to him now because they see in him somebody who is able to get something accomplished,” says Moore of the Southern Baptist Convention, noting that Rubio did help get a bill through the Senate.

“He was able to do that as a freshman senator,” Moore said. “He was pushing for strong border security measures, and he got a good deal of that in the negotiations.”

When Rubio announced his presidential bid on April 14, he chose to speak in Miami’s historic Freedom Tower — the Ellis Island of the Cuban exodus. He didn’t harp on immigration reform, but he did reach out, in his way, to America’s 11 million undocumented immigrants: “the single mother who works long hours for little pay so her children don’t have to struggle the way she has”; “the student who takes two buses before dawn to attend a better school halfway across town”; “the workers in our hotel kitchens, the landscaping crews in our neighborhoods, the late-night janitorial staff that clean our offices.” The sense Rubio gave in remarks was of a man who knows these people need his help — and who is committed to helping them in the long run, even if he stumbles along the way.

After the speech, Carlos Avila, a 31-year-old lawyer from New Jersey, stood outside Freedom Tower waiting for Rubio to exit. In 2008, Avila and his wife had voted for Obama, but now they were dissatisfied with the lack of economic progress “for people like us” and leaning Republican. Asked what he liked about Rubio, Avila, whose parents brought him to the U.S. from Ecuador when he was 4 years old, immediately mentioned immigration. “Rubio is not a perfect candidate,” Avila said. “But his immigration stance, I think it’s a political calculation. Obama was the same on gay marriage. I think if Rubio were to get into the White House, he would be supportive of immigration reform.”

Rubio’s staff believe their man has been battle-tested by his immigration experience. They may even believe that he — as the most prominent Latino in the field and the only Republican candidate who has actually shepherded immigration reform through the Senate — could do more, if elected, to fix America’s broken immigration system than anyone else.

The road ahead will prove whether they are right. A presidential election is an unforgiving affair; eventually, the person behind the politician is exposed. At some point before Nov. 8, 2016, Rubio will confront a crisis that will strip him bare and reveal him for either the fearless and inspirational leader that his foot soldiers believe him to be — or as a politician with his finger eternally to the wind.

With Another Bush Eyeing White House, Family Money Machine Springs to Life // WSJ // Beth Reinhard and Christopher S. Stewart - May 15, 2015

Democrat Hillary Clinton is the one presidential candidate expected to match or surpass Mr. Bush’s fundraising. She can turn to donors from her husband’s two presidential campaigns and her own 2008 bid. In addition, she stands to inherit much of PresidentBarack Obama’s fundraising network.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Bush, the former governor of Florida, recently told donors in Miami Beach that he raised more money in his first 100 days as a potential candidate than any previous Republican contender. (His brother set the previous record by collecting $37 million in the first few months of 1999.) The tally is widely expected to exceed $100 million, though details won't be disclosed until Mr. Bush's super PAC, Right to Rise, files a report by July 31 with the Federal Election Commission.

In Iowa, Will Jeb Bush's Opponents Hit Him on Iraq?

The Wall Street Journal identified 326 donors who hosted fundraisers this year for Mr. Bush's super PAC, based on invitations and news reports compiled by the Sunlight Foundation, a nonpartisan government watchdog.

One in five were either members of the "Team 100," those who raised at least $100,000 for the Republican National Committee during George H.W. Bush's 1988 presidential campaign—or "Pioneers" or "Rangers," who collected at least $100,000 or $200,000 for George W. Bush's national campaigns.

Nearly a quarter worked in at least one of the Bush White Houses or received a presidential appointment; 24 were tapped by Mr. Bush's father or brother to serve as ambassadors; 46 worked in Mr. Bush's administration in Florida or were appointed to advisory boards. A number of donors belong to more than one of these categories.

Mr. Bush's top allies include 11 billionaires, six former and current owners of professional sports teams and former Vice President Dan Quayle. There is an internationally competitive sailor, a former chairman of the U.S. Export-Import Bank, as well as the author of "Nice Guys Finish Rich: The Secrets of a Super Salesman."

Mr. Bush's Republican rivals are seeking support from a similar pool of well-heeled donors. But no one can match the deep-pocketed, multigenerational network boasted by the Bushes, many of whom have been close family friends for decades. Some paid visits to the family compound in Kennebunkport, Me., and watched the Bush children grow up.

"When you hitch your wagon to the Bushes, you become part of an extended family," saidDirk Van Dongen, a Washington lobbyist and former Pioneer and Ranger who helped organize two fundraisers for Jeb Bush. "They remember their friends and they are good to their friends."

William Draper, the former Export-Import Bank chairman who recently co-hosted a fundraiser for Mr. Bush in California, went to Yale with his father. Along with the annual Christmas cards from Barbara Bush, he said, "my wife gets a letter from her every few weeks."

Some relationships mix personal, political and financial ties. Craig Stapleton, a host of the first fundraiser for Mr. Bush's super PAC in Greenwich, Conn., for instance, received a presidential appointment from George H.W. Bush to the Peace Corps Board of Directors and co-owned the Texas Rangers baseball team with George W. Bush.

Mr. Stapleton, now a senior adviser at private-equity firm Stone Point Capital, went on to be a top fundraiser for George W. Bush's national campaigns. After Mr. Bush was elected president, he appointed Mr. Stapleton to two ambassadorships, first to the Czech Republic, then to France. Mr. Stapleton, who is married to the cousin of the first President Bush, didn't respond to a request for comment.

Bruce S. Gelb, former vice chairman of Bristol-Meyers Co. recently attended a Jeb Bush fundraiser in New York City. Mr. Gelb was appointed by the administration of George H.W. Bush to the U.S. Information Agency and then was offered an ambassadorship to Belgium after raising about $3 million for Mr. Bush's campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Both Democrats and Republicans have over the years embraced the tradition of rewarding donors with such coveted posts. “I didn’t realize it at the time there was some cachet of being ambassador,” said Mr. Gelb, a boarding-school classmate of Mr. Bush. “When you say you’ve been ambassador, people go a little bonkers.”

Mr. Gelb also was a Pioneer for George W. Bush and raised money for Jeb Bush’s, son,George P. Bush, in his 2014 campaign for Texas Land Commissioner.

Former President George W. Bush is credited with breaking ground on campaign fundraising by pushing supporters to bundle donations from their friends, family and business associates. Jeb Bush is continuing that strategy with more ambitious goals, even before an official campaign launch. Donors to his super PAC are divided among those who raise at least $500,000, $250,000, $100,000 and $50,000.

“Fundraising is to some extent a competitive sport that attracts type-A types who like to win,” Mr. Van Dongen said. “When you bring donors together, it’s like a company bringing together its top sales people—you get time with the boss, recognition in front of your peers.”

The Bush network has its limits. “All you can do is help someone get in the door,” saidLawrence E. Bathgate II, a longtime Bush family supporter. “But once the door is open, they have to sell themselves. That’s what’s confronting Jeb Bush.”

Bush compares Clinton's avoidance of questions to 'The Simpsons' // Des Moines Register // Jennifer Jacobs - May 16, 2015

DUBUQUE, Ia. – Jeb Bush invited Iowans to "ask whatever you want."

And they did — about how he feels about his brother's mistakes in Iraq and why he backs controversial education standards and other hot topics.

"We're probably around 800 to 900 questions asked and hopefully answered," Bush, a Republican who will make up his mind "pretty soon" about whether to run for president, said at the start of his town hall meeting at Loras College in Dubuque Saturday morning.

Bush said Democrat Hillary Clinton has been a candidate for a month and has answered only 13 questions from the press.

"She's had 33,000 ... minutes where she hasn't answered a question. For those that really follow TV, 33,000 minutes is two times the number of 'Simpson's' shows that existed in the 25 years," he said to laughs from an audience of a little more than 100.

The Dubuque event kicked off Bush's second trip to Iowa of the 2016 election cycle. Clinton makes her second trip here next week.

Bush is making hops around Iowa in a private plane – to two fundraisers in Iowa City for Republican U.S. Sen. Chuck Grassley, to private meetings in the Des Moines area, and then the Iowa GOP's Lincoln Dinner Saturday night. His wife, Columba, and son Jeb Jr. are traveling with him.

Bush, who is struggling to gain favor with likely GOP caucusgoers in Iowa, told the Dubuque audience he hadn't been there since he campaigned for his father, George H.W. Bush, in 1979 and 1980.

"I'll just remind everybody that's interested in political history. He started here in Iowa as an asterisk, literally an asterisk, and he won the Iowa caucuses," he said.

Bush took questions for nearly an hour, from 11 people in the crowd.

The first questioner asked about education, but made brief mention of Bush's interview with Fox News' Megyn Kelly on Monday. Bush has taken heat all week for telling Kelly he would've authorized the Iraq War "knowing what we know now." Bush later said he misinterpreted the question. His answers varied until Thursday, when he said: "I would not have gone into Iraq."

In Dubuque Saturday, Bush said: "I misstepped for sure. I answered a question that wasn't asked."

Another Iowan, 30-year-old Jeff Lenhart, a Dubuque Democrat who works at a homeless shelter, asked Bush how he feels about his brother being responsible for the deaths of 6,000 Americans in Iraq.

"Look, I'm proud of my brother," Bush answered to loud applause.

Bush continued: "The facts that were there for the president and in a bipartisan way approved – bipartisan in every way – was grounded on faulty intelligence. And they made mistakes along the way that related to not focusing on security first. My brother acknowledges that. I acknowledge that. Those were mistakes. ... My brother did something that I thought was pretty heroic and courageous. Against all odds politically, he rectified this by a that surge created a significantly more stable Iraq than he left."

Another questioner, Les Feldmann of Rickardsville, grilled Bush on common core education standards. Bush said he favors state-driven standards, and that the federal government should be expressly prohibited from getting involved.

When Feldmann persisted in questioning him, Bush said, to applause: "I'm just for higher standards, man. ... What we shouldn't have is low standards or no standards. That's the problem."

Later, Feldmann told the Des Moines Register he thinks what Bush did with education standards in Florida was "excellent." But Bush has been promoting the Common Core Education Standards, which are "copyrighted and patented," and involve the federal government hanging money over state officials' heads, Feldmann said.

Bush wrapped up his speech by saying that converting from the Episcopalian faith to Catholicism was "one of the smarted things I've ever done in my life." Dubuque has a disproportionately heavy Catholic population, and Loras is one of three Catholic colleges in the Dubuque diocese.

Elsewhere Saturday morning, GOP presidential candidate Rand Paul attracted about 160 in Burlington and Donald Trump, who is weighing a bid, drew nearly 200 in Sioux City.

WASHINGTON — Eight years after Hillary Rodham Clinton was haunted by her Senate vote to authorize the use of force in Iraq, another leading White House hopeful is struggling with questions about the war.

And just as Mrs. Clinton seemed torn then between mollifying Democratic primary voters who were against the war and positioning herself to run in the general election, Jeb Bush, a Republican, appears deeply conflicted. He is grappling with how to remain loyal to his older brother, George W. Bush, while acknowledging what has become a mainstream view in both parties: that there would not have been an invasion if policy makers had known in 2003 that Iraq did not have weapons of mass destruction.

In Arizona on Thursday, with his fourth different answer of the week, Mr. Bush, the former Florida governor, finally conceded that, if he had had such knowledge, he "would not have gone into Iraq."

For Mrs. Clinton in 2008, mishandling what her opponent Barack Obama called "the biggest foreign policy disaster of a generation" created an opening for him and ultimately helped undermine her campaign.

There is no strong antiwar current in today's Republican electorate as there was during the 2008 Democratic contest, but Iraq could prove just as thorny for Mr. Bush now because of what it represents.

The if-you-knew-then questions and gibes from his rivals about the 2003 invasion of Iraq are a stand-in for a larger challenge confronting Mr. Bush: demonstrating that he is not merely another would-be heir to a political dynasty.

"That's the issue here: Are you actually a unique, different person or are you a third Bush?" said former House Speaker Newt Gingrich. "To the degree that he's defined as a third Bush, he has a bigger mountain to climb, though I think he certainly has the potential to carve out a path because he has an extraordinary record as governor."

In his opening months as an all-but-declared candidate, Mr. Bush has seemed unsurprised, if irritated, by questions about how he is different from the previous presidents named Bush. He has explained that he loves his father and brother, but recognizes that he will have to make his own case to win the nomination. (Unmentioned is that much of his strength as a candidate owes to the fund-raising network he largely inherited from his family.)

Yet while he has been willing to address the issue of his family ties generally, the past week shows he is either unprepared or deeply reluctant to discuss specific policy issues stemming from his brother's presidency.

Mr. Bush's resistance to engage on Iraq also underlines the degree to which he is determined to run his campaign on his terms. But he may be too sure of himself and his approach.

His dayslong bobble became the talk of Republican politics, from the campaign trail in Nevada to Washington. A group of Republican senators meeting this week on Capitol Hill were nearly incredulous that Mr. Bush did not have a better answer and joked about how many press aides he needed to respond to such a basic matter, according to a party strategist who heard the conversation.

"Jeb's curb appeal was supposed to be experience, pedigree and smarts, and therefore ready to lead," said one Republican senator, who insisted on anonymity to speak candidly about a presidential hopeful. "These kinds of statements plant him squarely in the middle of the primary pack — with G.O.P. voters unsure of exactly what political lessons he truly has learned."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sensing vulnerability, and eyeing an opportunity to bring the closest thing there is to a Republican front-runner down a peg, Mr. Bush's primary opponents have pounced. Nearly all of them immediately and succinctly answered the question he dodged for days.

"I don't know how that was a hard question," Rick Santorum, the former senator from Pennsylvania, said Thursday at the Republican National Committee spring meeting in Arizona.

Some took advantage of the opening to attack Mr. Bush for what they say is the baggage he would bear as the party's nominee.

Senator Rand Paul, Republican of Kentucky, said that the country should be wary of "having a nominee who is stuck in relitigating the Iraq war."

"We need to know what we're getting ourselves in for," Mr. Paul said in an interview on Thursday. "The difficulty that Jeb is going to have is on two fronts. One, he's got conservative mistrust in the primary. That's going to be difficult to overcome. But should he become the nominee, he's going to have difficulty with independents who were opposed to the Iraq war. I see it as a very difficult place for him to be in."

Mr. Paul has his own difficulties: The Republican primary voters he must court, on the whole, are considerably more hawkish on national security than he is. But his remarks bluntly raised what has loomed over Mr. Bush's likely candidacy just as much as his positions on immigration or the Common Core education standards: the perception that he embodies the restoration of a dynasty many do not want to see restored.

Mr. Paul may overstate the extent of Mr. Bush's legacy problems with Republicans — a New York Times-CBS poll this month showed 7 in 10 Republicans viewed George W. Bush favorably. And there is little doubt that the party members are far more animated about what they see as President Obama's foreign policy blunders than about the mistakes of the last Bush administration.

But Mr. Bush's difficulties discussing his brother and Iraq hand his opponents the same cudgel that Mr. Obama so effectively used against Mrs. Clinton in 2008. "It is about the past versus the future," Mr. Obama said then. "And when I am the nominee, the Republicans won't be able to make this election about the past."

Or, as the conservative writer David Frum, a former speechwriter for George W. Bush, put it on Twitter this week: "Jeb Bush has just converted an election that should be about the past eight years into an election about the eight years before that."

Mr. Bush's aides say he is anxious to move past his schedule focused on fund-raising to a more intensive campaign that will allow him to discuss his own vision.

But it is unclear he will ever be able to shed himself of forced exercises in retrospection.

Danielle Pletka, a scholar at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, noted that when Senator Marco Rubio of Florida began his presidential campaign last month he "chose to do so with this explicit break with the past, which of course means the Bushes and the Clintons."

"That's going to be more resonant for Republicans than 'He's going to get us into another Iraq war,' " Ms. Pletka said.

Mr. Bush's overarching problem "is this eternal relitigation of every decision of George W. Bush," she added.

"As much as he's saying 'I'm my own man,' every time he says that, we're reminded he's not."

Five Ways That Jeb Bush Makes it Hard for Himself // New Yorker // Amy Davidson - May 16, 2015

Running for President is hard. And there are factors that can make it harder still, a variety of which Jeb Bush modelled this week, in florid fashion. It started with this exchange, with Megyn Kelly:

Kelly: On the subject of Iraq.

Bush: Yuuup.

Kelly: Obviously very controversial. Knowing what we know now, would you have authorized the invasion?

Bush: I would have. And so would have Hillary Clinton, just to remind everybody, and so would have almost everybody who was confronted with the intelligence they got.

This wasn't a good answer, even though, as Rick Santorum, of all people, correctly pointed out, "I don't know how that was a hard question." And, having made a mistake with the invasion, Jeb Bush proceeded to bungle the occupation, taking four days and many grumpy contortions to get from his first answer to the testy statement, on Thursday, that "Knowing what we now know, what would you have done? I would not have engaged. I would not have gone into Iraq." Why was that so difficult? Here are five ways that Jeb Bush made, and may continue to make, running for President hard.

1. He didn't listen. "I interpreted the question wrong, I guess," Bush told Sean Hannity on Tuesday. He said something similar on Wednesday: "Whatever I heard, it was translated, knowing what you knew then what would you do?" But there was no ambiguity in Kelly's question. Perhaps it was "translated" from the language of what was actually said to that of whatever Jeb Bush wanted to hear. He might have thought, in the lacuna of that "Yup," I'm a smart guy and I know what Megyn Kelly is going to say, even before she gets the words out. Both of those explanations are, to an extent, credible, based on the Hillary Clinton reference in his answer. (She voted to authorize the war, but has said that her decision might have been different if the intelligence had been better.) But neither is admirable and both are harbingers of disastrous debates—not to mention Oval Office meetings ("Whatever the Prime Minister said, it was translated…"). Obama has his anger translator; maybe Jeb Bush has a complacency translator.

2. He didn't have an answer ready. There are a lot of predictable questions when you're running for President, and, after being sure that you know which is being asked, you should be ready to answer them. This would be true of questions far more obscure than a central decision of your party's last President—a President who happened to be your brother. (It's worth noting that some people were opposed to the war, knowing what they knew then.) After he and Hannity had dealt with the supposed mysteriousness of Kelly's question, and Bush had delivered a swirl of phrases related to Iraq, in what appeared to be no particular order ("there were mistakes"; "the surge was quite effective"; "we need to make sure that our friends know that we have their back"), Hannity tried to get him to focus:

Hannity: In other words, in 20/20 hindsight, you would make a different decision.

Bush: Yeah, I don't know what that decision would have been, that's a hypothetical. The simple fact is that mistakes were made. As they always are in life and foreign policy.

And in campaigns. How could Jeb Bush have come to an interview that was set up as a do-over without any answer at all? Perhaps it is because of his next mistake:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

3. He assumed that people agree that “hypothetical” is a dirty, out-of-bounds word. “That’s a hypothetical”—well, yes, because you aren’t President yet, and we want to know what you would do if you were. That’s a hypothetical. Perhaps what Bush meant was “past-counterfactual”—but there’s nothing wrong with that sort of question, either. Bush is not alone in this trait, unfortunately; in the primary debates, we can expect to see many candidates using “hypothetical” as a synonym for “trick question” or “weird”—”gotcha” with five syllables, each an accusation of media fanciness. As a dodge, though, it falls apart with the sort of questions to which people expect a simple answer. Voters in the voting booth must make the best guess they can. Hypotheticals help. When Bush, on Thursday, prefaced his belated definitive answer with a sighing, snappish “If we’re all supposed to answer hypotheticals,” the effect was unpleasant. He sounded like…

4. He might live in a bubble. This is what confused Santorum: “I’ve been asked that question a hundred times.” Where and with whom does Bush spend his time talking, if he’s been avoiding it? His foreign-policy team might be too wrapped up in its own rationalizing, or, worse, an enduring belief that there was a lot of good in that war. But, as with the other bad habits listed here, this goes beyond Iraq, to the question of whether Jeb Bush is too cosseted by parental and establishment blessings—raising money has been easy for him—to realize what hard work becoming, and being, President might be. Yes, his brother did it, but he did it badly. As Santorum also said, of the campaign, “If you are not prepared for it, I think we’ve seen in the past you are not going to do very, very well. This is a long process.”

5. He suggested that his impulse to uphold familial honor was an answer, not its own question. Bush acted as if it were pure bad manners to ask him to comment on other Bushes. “I’m not going to go out of my way to say that my brother did this wrong or my dad did this wrong,” he said on Thursday, according to the A.P. “It’s just not going to happen. I have a hard time with that. I love my family a lot.” What are voters to make of “it’s just not going to happen”? Should they assume that, as President, he will say that his father and his brother were right, and act the same way? Or will he say that they were right, but then act in the way that he thinks is right, without ever reconciling those positions or explaining his own rationale? Maybe it’s indelicate to put one brother in the position of having to say what he thinks of another. But then the brother shouldn’t run for President. Delicacy in this case is the enemy of democracy.

But the family question does suggest a way that the pressure on Jeb Bush might ease, if he does manage to get the nomination: many of the weaknesses on his list are Hillary Clinton’s, too.

Dzhokhar Tsarnaev Given Death Penalty in Boston Marathon Bombing // NYT // Katharine Q. Seelye - May 15, 2015

BOSTON — Two years after bombs in two backpacks transformed the Boston Marathon from a sunny rite of spring to a smoky battlefield with bodies dismembered, a federal jury on Friday condemned Dzhokhar Tsarnaev to death for his role in the 2013 attack.

In a sweeping rejection of the defense case, the jury found that death was the appropriate punishment for six of 17 capital counts — all six related to Mr. Tsarnaev’s planting of a pressure-cooker bomb on Boylston Street, which his lawyers never disputed. Mr. Tsarnaev, 21, stood stone-faced in court, his hands folded in front of him, as the verdict was read, his lawyers standing grimly at his side.

Immediate reaction was mostly subdued.

“Happy is not the word I would use,” said Karen Brassard, who suffered grievous leg injuries in the bombing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“There’s nothing happy about having to take somebody’s life. I’m satisfied, I’m grateful that they came to that conclusion, because for me I think it was the just conclusion.”

She said she understood that all-but-certain appeals meant the case could drag out over years if not decades. “But right now,” she said, “it feels like we can take a breath and kind of actually breathe again.”

The bombings two years ago turned one of this city’s most cherished athletic events into a grim tragedy — the worst terrorist attack on American soil since Sept. 11, 2001. Three people were killed, and 17 people lost at least one leg. More than 240 others sustained serious injuries.

Last month, after deliberating for 11 hours, the jury found Mr. Tsarnaev guilty of all 30 charges against him in connection with the bombings and the death a few days later of a fourth person, an M.I.T. police officer. The same jury spent 14 hours over three days deliberating the sentence.

With its decision, the jury rejected virtually every argument that the defense put forth, including the centerpiece of its case — that Mr. Tsarnaev’s older brother, Tamerlan, had held a malevolent sway over him and led him into committing the crimes.

According to verdict forms that the jurors completed, only three of the 12 jurors believed that Dzhokhar Tsarnaev had acted under his brother’s influence.

Beyond that, the jury put little stock in any part of the defense. Only two jurors believed that Mr. Tsarnaev had expressed sorrow and remorse for his actions, a stinging rebuke to the assertion by Sister Helen Prejean, a Roman Catholic nun and renowned death penalty opponent, that he was “genuinely sorry” for what he had done.

When the jury entered the courtroom at 3:10 p.m. Friday, the forewoman passed an envelope to Judge George A. O’Toole Jr. of United States District Court, who had presided over the case. Jurors remained standing while the clerk read aloud the 24-page verdict form, which took 20 minutes. It was not clear until the end that the sentence was death, though all signs along the way pointed in that direction.

Not a sound was heard in the packed courtroom throughout the proceedings. Those in attendance — survivors, victims’ families, the public, the news media — had been sternly warned that any outburst would amount to contempt of court.

The Tsarnaev verdict goes against the grain in Massachusetts, which has no death penalty for state crimes. Throughout the trial, polls also showed that residents overwhelmingly favored life in prison for Mr. Tsarnaev.

Many respondents said that life in prison for one so young would be a fate worse than death, and some worried that execution would make him a martyr.

But all the jurors in his case had to be “death qualified” — willing to impose the death penalty to serve. In that sense, the jury was not representative of the state.

Mayor Martin J. Walsh said in a statement that the sentencing brought “a small amount of closure to the survivors, families and all impacted by the violent and tragic events.” His statement avoided explicit praise of the verdict.

Some legal experts said that the jury's 14 hours of deliberations seemed relatively quick in a case this complex. Eric M. Freedman, a death penalty specialist at Hofstra University Law School, said that the relative speed of the verdict could provide the defense with two possible grounds for appeal: "the failure to grant a change of venue, despite the overwhelming evidence the defense presented about community attitudes in Boston," he said, and "the failure to instruct the jury that if a single juror refused to vote for death, the result would be a life sentence."

"Unfortunately for all concerned," Mr. Freedman said, "this is only the first step on a long road."

But other lawyers said that 14 hours was not all that fast and doubted that it provided grounds for appeal.

"I've seen juries return verdicts in 25 minutes if the evidence is strong," said Michael Kendall, a former federal prosecutor in Boston. "But rarely do you have a case like this — a crime of such enormity to start with, plus a mountain of evidence and a defendant who is so unsympathetic."

He said he thought the jury had been struck by Mr. Tsarnaev's callousness. "After he blows up this child on purpose," he said of 8-year-old Martin Richard, the youngest of the victims, "he's out at the convenience store buying milk, then he smokes a little dope and plans on blowing up New York."

Among those in the courtroom were Bill and Denise Richard, the parents of Martin and of a daughter, Jane, who was 7 when she lost a leg in the attack. Despite their losses, the Richard family had called for Mr. Tsarnaev to receive life in prison. They said they feared that appeals would drag out a death sentence for years, making it hard for them to move forward with their lives.

The jury, which was not sequestered, had been told to shield itself from news accounts of the trial, and it is not known whether word of the Richard family's decision had filtered through to any of the jurors.

Many of the jurors looked emotionally depleted after the sentence was read, with some near tears. They had been involved in the case since January, when jury selection began, and had heard testimony over 10 weeks, much of it gruesome and horrific as survivors described losing their limbs and their loved ones.

Judge O'Toole did not set a date for formally sentencing Mr. Tsarnaev. But at that point, some of the survivors will have a chance to tell the court — and Mr. Tsarnaev — how the bombings had affected their lives.

It was the first time a federal jury had sentenced a terrorist to death in the post-Sept. 11 era, according to Kevin McNally, director of the Federal Death Penalty Resource Counsel Project, which coordinates the defense in capital punishment cases.

Attorney General Loretta E. Lynch called the death sentence a "fitting punishment."

In Russia, when informed of the verdict by a reporter, Mr. Tsarnaev's father, Anzor, simply exhaled and hung up. He then turned off his cellphone.

Prosecutors had portrayed Mr. Tsarnaev, who immigrated to Cambridge, Mass., from the Russian Caucasus with his family in 2002, as a coldblooded, unrepentant jihadist who sought to kill innocent Americans in retaliation for the deaths of innocent Muslims in American-led wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"After all of the carnage and fear and terror that he has caused, the right decision is clear," a federal prosecutor, Steven Mellin, said in his closing argument. "The only sentence that will do justice in this case is a sentence of death."

With death sentences, an appeal is all but inevitable, and the process generally takes years if not decades to play out. Of the 80 federal defendants sentenced to death since 1988, only three, including Timothy J. McVeigh, the Oklahoma City bomber, have been executed. Some of the sentences were vacated or the defendants died or committed suicide.

Most cases are still tied up in appeal.

Republican Party to Vote in Support of Religious-Freedom Laws // TIME // Zeke J. Miller - May 15, 2015

The Republican National Committee is expected to approve a resolution Thursday reaffirming support for so-called Religious Freedom Restoration Acts, undeterred by controversy in Indiana and Arkansas over whether such measures sanction discrimination against gays and lesbians.

The Resolution Affirming Religious Freedom Restoration Acts (RFRA) passed through the RNC's resolutions committee Wednesday during the RNC's spring meeting in Scottsdale, Ariz., and will be voted on by the full 168-member governing body Friday. The party traditionally votes on all resolutions as a package, and the RFRA resolution is expected to pass with little or no opposition.

"The Republican National Committee stands firm in upholding natural, human, constitutional, and, under the RFRA, statutory rights of religious freedom," the resolution states.

A nationwide firestorm erupted after Indiana Governor Mike Pence signed a RFRA resolution into law that critics contended would allow business owners with religious objections to opt out of servicing same-sex weddings. Indiana's resolution went further than the federal statute, which has been on the books since the Clinton administration. A similar controversy in Arkansas led to Governor Asa Hutchinson demanding changes to the law to bring it in line with the federal statute before signing it.

The cautiously worded RNC resolution encourages states to mirror the federal law, rather than the controversial Indiana version.

"The Republican National Committee supports and encourages States' actions to enact laws that mirror the federal RFRA to protect citizens' rights to lead all aspects of their lives according to their deeply held religious beliefs," it states.

The resolution comes as the issue of religious freedom has become a significant conversation piece on the presidential campaign trail.

"The Republican Party will always stand for and defend religious freedom," RNC press secretary Allison Moore tells TIME.

Separate RNC resolutions expected to pass Friday include one supporting Republican lawmakers in their criticism of the emerging nuclear agreement between the Obama Administration and Iran, and another calling for the replacement of the Administrative Procedure Act, a law that sets how executive agencies propose and enact regulations.

Yet another resolution reaffirms the party's neutrality in the presidential nominating procedure, even as the RNC has seized control of the debate process. The party and television networks hosting the early debates this summer are struggling with how to include a field of more than a dozen candidates on stage.

FBI Investigating Possible Links Between Amtrak Crash, Other Trains Hit by Objects // ABC News // Dean Schabner and Meghan Keneally - May 16, 2015

The FBI is looking into whether there is any link between three different trains that were all apparently hit by objects just a few miles apart, within a few minutes, the night of the deadly Amtrak derailment.

One of those was the Amtrak train that derailed Tuesday night north of Philadelphia, killing eight people and injuring more than 200. Another was another Amtrak train, a southbound Acela train that was apparently hit in a passenger window.

The third was a SEPTA commuter train that had its windshield shattered, and train personnel believed someone had shot at them.

Philadelphia transit police dispatchers can be heard on scanner audio from Tuesday night, warning that a commuter train may have been shot at.

The train was held at the North Philadelphia Train Station that night, after one of its winshields was struck by an object and shattered.

"Transit 1, let those personnel know, the rock put out a text, that that train was shot at, so use caution," a SEPTA Transit Police dispatcher can be heard saying on the scanner audio posted by Broadcastify.com. "All units copy."

A conductor on the Amtrak train that crashed Tuesday night also told investigators that she remembers hearing the train's engineer "say something about his train being struck by something" to a different train's engineer. The windshield of the Amtrak train was also found to be damaged.

On another recording of scanner calls from Tuesday night posted by Broadcastify.com, dispatchers can be heard discussing that SEPTA train.

"The train that's standing is the one that's standing by North Philadelphia regional rail," a dispatcher can be heard saying. "An unknown object made contact with that train shattering the windshield. We do not have an update on any injuries because they are prohibited from making any communication with the engineer while he's still on the rail. But it is a train that has had a foreign or unknown object make contact, shattering the windshield the train is going to be standing on the hill."

According to SEPTA, an unknown projectile struck the engineer's window of SEPTA Trenton Line train #769 at around 9:10 p.m. Tuesday. The engineer did not report any injuries. The train was initially held near the North Philadelphia Station based on damage to the train window and later based on the suspension of the line due to the Amtrak derailment.

The 80 passengers were walked off the train and transferred to buses, SEPTA said.

The Amtrak engineer, identified earlier this week as Brandon Bastion, met with National Transportation Safety Board investigators today and he was "extremely cooperative," NTSB board member Robert Sumwalt said Friday evening.

Bastion told investigators that the last thing he remembered happening before the crash was ringing the train bell as he passed through the North Philadelphia train stop. He did not mention anything about his alleged radio conversation with a local Philadelphia train engineer.

Sumwalt said that the conversation was brought to light during an interview with one of the Amtrak train's three conductors who was on board at the time of the crash. That conductor told investigators that she overheard the conversation between the two engineers on her portable radio just moments before the train derailed.

"Right after she recalled hearing this conversation between her engineer and the SEPTA engineer, she felt rumbling and her car went over on its side," Sumwalt said.

Tornadoes touch down in parts of Texas, Oklahoma // Reuters // Sharon Bernstein - May 16, 2015

Several tornadoes touched down in northwest Texas and western Oklahoma Saturday evening, part of an night of severe weather predicted for a swath of the U.S. ranging from Oklahoma to Nebraska, the National Weather Service said.

The twisters that swept down to the ground in the Texas panhandle and in Oklahoma in the early part of the evening landed in areas that were not highly populated, said Keli Pirtle, a spokeswoman for the Storm Prediction Center of the National Weather Service.

Throughout the central and southern Great Plains of the U.S. forecasters predicted thunderstorms, high winds, hail and more tornadoes for Saturday night.

A tornado that hit the city of Van, Texas, southeast of Dallas, May 10 killed two people and caused $40 million in damage, authorities said.

About 90 houses were destroyed in the town, which has a population of 2,500.

Abu Sayyaf, key ISIS figure in Syria, killed in U.S. raid // CNN // Laura Smith-Spark and Ray Sanchez - May 16, 2015

(CNN)U.S. Special Operations forces killed a key ISIS commander during a daring raid in eastern Syria overnight Friday to Saturday -- securing intelligence on how the terror organization operates, communicates and earns money, U.S. government officials said.

The ISIS commander, Abu Sayyaf, was killed in a heavy firefight after he resisted capture in the raid at al-Omar, U.S. Secretary of Defense Ash Carter said in a statement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sayyaf's wife, an Iraqi named Umm Sayyaf, was caught and is being held in Iraq.

The ground operation was led by the Army's Delta Force, sources familiar with the mission told CNN. There were about two dozen members of Delta Force involved, sources said. They were part of a multi-branch force of about 100, the sources told CNN's Barbara Starr.

Carter said he had ordered the raid at the direction of President Barack Obama. All the U.S. troops involved returned safely.

National Security Council spokeswoman Bernadette Meehan said Obama had authorized the raid "upon the unanimous recommendation of his national security team" and as soon as the United States was confident all the pieces were in place for the operation to succeed.

"Abu Sayyaf was a senior ISIL leader who, among other things, had a senior role in overseeing ISIL's illicit oil and gas operations -- a key source of revenue that enables the terrorist organization to carry out their brutal tactics and oppress thousands of innocent civilians," she said in a statement.

"He was also involved with the group's military operations."

Abu Sayyaf was a Tunisian citizen, a senior administration official said.

A U.S. official with direct knowledge of the intelligence and the ground operation described Sayyaf as "CFO of all of ISIS with expertise in oil and gas" who played a increasing role in operations, planning and communications.

"We now have reams of data on how ISIS operates, communicates and earns its money," the official told CNN, referring to some of the communications elements, such as computers, seized in the raid.

Umm Sayyaf, his wife, is currently in military detention in Iraq. A young woman from the Yazidi religious minority was rescued.

"We suspect that Umm Sayyaf is a member of ISIL, played an important role in ISIL's terrorist activities, and may have been complicit in the enslavement of the young woman rescued last night," said Meehan. ISIL is an alternative acronym for ISIS.

Meehan said Umm Sayyaf was being debriefed about ISIL operations, including any information she may have on hostages held by the terror group.

Abu Sayyaf and his wife are suspected to be involved in or have deep knowledge of ISIS hostage operations, a U.S. official with knowledge of the operation told CNN. A team from the FBI-led High Value Interrogation Group is expected to interrogate the wife, the source said. They will seek to figure out what she may know about the capture, movement and treatment of hostages.

But Michael Weiss, author of "ISIS: Inside the Army of Terror," said Abu Sayyaf was largely unknown to close observers of the organization.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Weiss said he's skeptical the United States would risk lives to capture the head of ISIS's oil operations. ISIS hasn't made significant money from captured oil fields since U.S. bombers began striking its infrastructure, he said.

A Pentagon spokesman confirmed in February that oil is no longer a main source of revenue for ISIS.

"It may be the case that he wasn't the primary target in this operation," Weiss said. "The U.S. might have been trying to kill or capture a higher-value ISIS leader who was thought to be at the same location. But it'd make sense to play up Abu Sayyaf's prominence after the fact since U.S. soldiers' lives were at risk here."

But risking American lives to capture Abu Sayyaf makes sense to Derek Harvey, a former U.S. Army colonel, intelligence officer and the director of the Global Initiative for Civil Society and Conflict at the University of South Florida.

"The most important thing about the raid is not getting Abu Sayyaf; it's getting his records," Harvey said.

Harvey asserted that Sayyaf was one of ISIS's top financiers, with likely access to the group's contacts with banks, donors, Turkish and Lebanese business interests as well as links to criminal and smuggling networks.

Sayyaf might not have been the intended target, Harvey acknowledged. But he had undeniable value as a target because ISIS is also a business.

"They're meticulous record-keepers," he said.

Meehan's statement added that Obama is "grateful to the brave U.S. personnel who carried out this complex mission as well as the Iraqi authorities for their support of the operation and for the use of their facilities, which contributed to its success."

Meehan said the U.S. did not coordinate with nor advise Syria in advance of the operation.

"We have warned the Assad regime not to interfere with our ongoing efforts against ISIL inside of Syria," she said, adding that the "brutal actions of the regime have aided and abetted the rise of ISIL and other extremists in Syria."

Airdrop, firefight

There is reason to believe that Abu Sayyaf may have been in contact with ISIS leader Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi, sources familiar with the operation told CNN.

Although he was not taken alive, U.S. forces did capture some of his communications equipment, the sources said.

More details are starting to emerge of how the overnight raid deep in ISIS-controlled territory was carried out.

There was hand-to-hand combat during the operation, which was helicopter-borne, the sources told CNN.

About a dozen ISIS fighters were killed in the firefight at a residential building in Deir Ezzor, the sources said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A senior administration official told CNN the purpose of the mission was to capture the target, but he engaged U.S. forces so was killed. While the purpose was to capture the forces had the option to kill if they deemed it necessary, the official said.

Meanwhile, the Syrian Observatory for Human Rights, a London-based monitoring group, said at least 19 ISIS militants had been killed by coalition bombing targeting ISIS' location in al-Omar oil field in eastern Deir Ezzor in the early hours of Saturday.

Preliminary information indicates that the U.S.-led coalition airdropped forces following the bombardment, it said.

There are six oil and gas fields in Deir Ezzor, all of which fell into ISIS hands in July last year. They include al-Omar oil field, Syria's largest oil facility.

Computer records

Abu Sayyaf is not a name familiar to many ISIS watchers and may well be a pseudonym. Sources familiar with the operation said he also was known by the names Abu Muhammad al Iraqi and Abd al Ghani.

But the fact that the United States clearly had him under close watch and was ready to put its forces at risk to carry out a ground raid, rather than ordering a drone strike, suggests the target was seen as very valuable.

CNN National Security Analyst Peter Bergen said the decision to send in U.S. Special Operations forces into Syria was unusual but not unprecedented.

"Taking out the guy who runs effectively the most important financing stream is obviously significant, but what's really significant is the computer records and all the materials that he would have with him as the head of this financing arm, if indeed that is the case that he is really that important," said Bergen.

The potential to seize valuable intelligence material and documents may have been what led the U.S. government to opt for a high-risk ground operation rather than a bombing mission, he said.

Such targeted operations push ISIS to be more careful about how they organize themselves and run their operations, he said. "They are going to be looking over their shoulder."

Interrogation of Umm Sayyaf may also yield valuable information.

For weeks, unconfirmed reports have been circulating that al Baghdadi was seriously injured in an airstrike back in March in northern Iraq. That has led to speculation over who might emerge as his successor if he is incapacitated.

Iraqi authorities have said Abu Alaa al-Afari, his top deputy, and a senior ISIS security figure named Akram Qirbash were recently killed in an airstrike.

ISIS advance in Ramadi

The U.S. operation comes at the same time as a months-long fight for the key central Iraqi city of Ramadi appears to be going ISIS' way.

The Islamist extremist group captured the police headquarters, the Ramadi Great Mosque and even raised its trademark black flag over the provincial government building, sources said Friday.

The ISIS push began Thursday, with armored bulldozers and at least 10 suicide bombings used to burst through gates and blast through walls in Ramadi, according to a security source who has since left the city. Dozens of militants followed them into the city center.

Iraqi and allied forces have fought back, with a number of coalition airstrikes targeting ISIS assets around Ramadi, in Anbar province.

ISIS controls a huge swath of territory across Iraq and Syria, where it is chief among the opposition groups fighting to unseat long embattled Syrian President Bashar al-Assad.

Officials: Islamic State tightens grip on capital of Iraq's Anbar province // WaPo // Mustafa Salim and Hugh Naylor - May 16, 2015

BAGHDAD — Islamic State militants tightened their grip on Ramadi on Saturday as officials, police and residents accused the Sunni extremists of executing dozens of civilians and blowing up homes in the capital of Iraq's largest province.

On Thursday, the insurgent group launched a brutal offensive involving car bombings and heavy shelling to seize Ramadi, which is about 80 miles west of Baghdad. The militants controlled most of the city by Friday afternoon, hoisting the group's black flag over government buildings as pro-government forces retreated.

"They blew up the houses of the officers and [tribal] sheiks who fought them," said Hamid Shandoukh, a Ramadi police colonel, speaking by telephone from the city's Malaab area.

The attack is a significant setback to Iraq's U.S.-backed government, which is waging a military campaign to retake territory that the Islamic State seized in sweeping advances last summer. The United States has assumed a prominent role in that effort, leading an international coalition that is conducting airstrikes against the extremist group in Iraq as well as in Syria.

Dozens of residents across Ramadi have been executed by Islamic State fighters, including women and children, according to residents and pro-government forces. "We don't have precise figures, but we can say that dozens of them were shot by Daesh," Shandoukh said, using the Arabic term for the group.

Police, counterterrorism forces and tribal fighters have retreated to Malaab and a nearby military command hub, where hundreds of them are surrounded by Islamic State fighters. Police and local officials say that supply lines to the facility have been cut and that those on the inside are in desperate need of food as well as military reinforcements to defend against shelling and car bombings.

“We are calling on the government to provide food as well as military reinforcements to these areas that are besieged by Daesh,” said Suleiman Kubaysi, head of media relations for Anbar’s provincial council. He spoke by telephone from Baghdad.

Anbar capital is a key prize

Ramadi, capital of the largely Sunni province of Anbar, has been a stronghold of opposition to the Islamic State and its al-Qaeda precursor. A little less than a decade ago, the city’s residents were at the forefront of a U.S.-backed revolt by Sunni tribesmen against al-Qaeda.

Ramadi’s apparent fall is a major blow to U.S.-supported efforts by the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi to form another Sunni force against the Islamic State, said Hassan Hassan, an Abu Dhabi-based Middle East analyst and co-author of “ISIS: Inside the Army of Terror.” ISIS and ISIL are acronyms for the Islamic State.

“This is a heavy blow to the idea of getting Iraq’s Sunnis to rise up to fight ISIS,” he said, adding that Ramadi is “vital” to such an effort. Despite capturing most of Anbar last summer, the Islamic State had been unable to conquer Ramadi in repeated attempts that included an attack last month. In that assault, militants gained control of northern areas of the city.

Now, with its capture of most of the city, the Islamic State has received a major morale boost after losing significant territory recently to Iraqi forces, including the city of Tikrit, Hassan said. “This is important for ISIS in terms of bouncing back and reclaiming momentum,” he said.

During a telephone call Friday that highlights concern in Washington about the Ramadi attacks, Vice President Biden promised Abadi deliveries of heavy weapons, the White House said.

During a television interview Saturday morning, an Iraqi military spokesman, Brig. Gen. Saad Maan, said that troop reinforcements had been sent to the city. “Painful” airstrikes from the U.S.-managed coalition also inflicted damage on the Islamic State, he said, without giving details of the military support.

Kubaysi, the provincial councilman, said a convoy of several dozen military vehicles carrying soldiers and counterterrorism forces arrived at the Malaab area from Baghdad on Saturday afternoon. But the additional troops have not engaged in fighting, he said.

“They are waiting for more reinforcements to arrive from Baghdad before they fight,” he said.

Falih al-Essawi, deputy head of Anbar’s provincial council, said that several members of Iraq’s SWAT team arrived Friday night but that the city is still waiting for special forces units to join the fight.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Coalition airstrikes were targeting militants in the city, Essawi said. He added that officials put the preliminary death toll from recent fighting in Ramadi at more than 500 people, including police, soldiers and civilians.

Unconfirmed video posted on social media by the Islamic State shows the group's fighters capturing the main hospital in downtown Ramadi. In photographs posted online, the group also claims to have seized rocket-propelled grenades, boxes of ammunition and vehicles from police and military installations in the city. The group also posted pictures of what it says are executions in the city.

Informants in 'sleeper cells'

Col. Eissa al-Alwani of the Ramadi police said the pro-government forces besieged in the city's military operations compound were quickly running out of ammunition. The Islamic State is targeting the compound, where three of Alwani's brothers are trapped, with heavy shelling and car bombs, he said.

In other parts of the city, he said, Islamic State "sleeper cells" have begun informing the group's fighters about residents who joined the police and military. Those who were identified as government collaborators, including families, are being executed and their homes are being blown up, Alwani said.

"Yesterday, they killed 20 of my cousins, and they blew up my house in Albu Alwan," he said by telephone from the Malaab area.

He added: "There will be a massacre if there is no help."

In the battle for Tikrit, about 120 miles north of Baghdad, pro-Iran Shiite militias proved decisive in overwhelming Islamic State forces.

But those militias have not participated in the fight in Anbar, in part over fear of stoking sectarian tensions with the area's largely Sunni residents. The Islamic State took control of most of Anbar by capitalizing on Sunni grievances with the Shiite-led government in Baghdad.

Bodies of Marines, Nepalese Recovered From Crashed Chopper // NYT // The Associated Press - May 16, 2015

KATHMANDU, Nepal — The bodies of six Marines and two Nepalese soldiers who were aboard a U.S. Marine helicopter that crashed during a relief mission in earthquake-hit Nepal have been recovered, Nepal's army said.

The wreckage of the UH-1 "Huey" was found Friday following days of intense searching in the mountains northeast of capital Kathmandu. The first three charred bodies were retrieved the same day by Nepalese and U.S. military teams, and the rest on Saturday, the Nepalese army said in a statement .

The aircraft went missing while delivering aid on Tuesday.

Lt. Gen. John Wissler, commander of the Marine-led joint task force, said in Kathmandu on Friday that his team could not immediately determine the cause of the crash or identify the bodies found.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He described the crash as "severe," and said the recovery team at the site encountered extreme weather and difficult terrain.

The wreckage was located about 24 kilometers (15 miles) from the town of Charikot, near where the aircraft went missing while delivering humanitarian aid to villages hit by two deadly earthquakes.

The area is near Gothali village in the district of Dolakha, about 80 kilometers (50 miles) northeast of Kathmandu.

The U.S. relief mission was deployed soon after a magnitude-7.8 quake hit April 25, killing more than 8,200 people. It was followed by a magnitude-7.3 quake on Tuesday that killed at least 117 people and injured around 2,800.

The helicopter had been delivering rice and tarps in Charikot, the area worst hit by Tuesday's quake. It had dropped off supplies in one location and was en route to a second site when contact was lost.

U.S. military officials said earlier in the week that an Indian helicopter in the air nearby had heard radio chatter from the Huey aircraft about a possible fuel problem.

In Wichita, Kansas, Marine officials on Saturday notified the parents of the helicopter's 31-year-old-pilot, Capt. Chris Norgren, that he was among those killed in the crash, a local high school president, Leticia Nielsen, told The Wichita Eagle newspaper.

A total of 300 U.S. military personnel have been supporting the aid mission in Nepal.

On Saturday, Elhadj As Sy, secretary-general of the International Federation of Red Cross, said an appeal had been made for $93 million to help some 700,000 earthquake survivors over the next two years.

The U.N. General Assembly also called for urgent assistance to help Nepal's earthquake survivors and to rebuild the impoverished Himalayan nation, urging the international community to support the U.N.'s appeal for $415 million for essential needs over the next three months.

Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon told the assembly that it is urgent to get aid to all those in need before the monsoon season starts in June.

Afghan forces straining to keep the expanding Taliban at bay // WaPo // Tim Craig - May 16, 2015

KABUL — Taliban militants are expanding their reach into new areas of Afghanistan, straining security forces who are locked in some of the bloodiest battles of the 13-year-old insurgency, provincial and local law-enforcement officials said.

In the first spring fighting season since the U.S.-led coalition ended combat operations in Afghanistan, heavy clashes are being reported in at least 10 Afghan provinces. The provinces are in every corner of the country, creating widespread unease about whether the Afghan government and army can repel the threat.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“This is the worst fighting season in a decade,” said Attiqullah Amerkhil, a Kabul-based political and military analyst. “There is now fighting in every part of the country.”

Such dire assessments have become something of an annual tradition here, where it’s difficult for analysts and journalists to safely obtain information from rural areas of the country. But coalition statistics and interviews with nearly two dozen provincial officials suggest that security is indeed worsening in many areas of the country.

Since January, Afghan soldiers have experienced 70 percent more casualties than in the same period last year, according to Col. Brian Tribus, director of public affairs for the U.S.-led coalition in Afghanistan. Civilian casualties have increased 10 percent over that same period.

The violence can be partially attributed to an expanding battlefield that is testing the 174,000-man army’s ability to respond. The ongoing Pakistani military operation has driven scores of militants across the border in search of new safe havens.

That has created a tightening geographic ring of chaos around the Afghan capital, presenting a major challenge for Afghan President Ashraf Ghani and the country’s chief executive, Abdullah Abdullah.

“The Taliban is taking advantage of a weak government, and there is a lack of coordination between Afghan forces, so they just keep attacking more districts,” said Mohammad Asif Afghan, a local police commander in Helmand province in southwestern Afghanistan.

In Ghowr province in central Afghanistan, most residents of two major districts fled their homes this week because of the fighting, according to Raqeeba Naeel, who represents the province in parliament.

Meanwhile, on Saturday, the Taliban abducted 30 motorists, including women and children, from highways in Paktika province near the eastern border with Pakistan, according to local police. In a statement, the Taliban confirmed the abductions, saying it was looking for government officials.

Some of the worst violence is happening in Kunduz province in northern Afghanistan, where the army rushed reinforcements to keep control of the provincial capital. But local officials say the situation remains tense.

“Residents are terrified, and everyone is concerned that the Taliban may attack this city again,” said Mohammad Yousuf Ayubi, the head of the provincial council, who added militants still control many surrounding districts.

On Friday, Doctors Without Borders/Médecins Sans Frontières (MSF) reported it has received 204 “war-wounded” at its trauma center in Kunduz since mid-April. That is more than double the number of patients it treated because of fighting last year.

“The surgeons are dealing with severe abdominal and chest injuries, with many patients requiring a series of complex surgical interventions, said Laurent Gabriel, the MSF coordinator at the trauma center, who noted that one-fourth of the “war-wounded” patients have been women or children.

Hekmatullah Azamy, a researcher at the Kabul-based Center for Conflict and Peace Studies, also blamed the Ghani government for the worsening violence. Instead of preparing his government and army for a tough spring season, Azamy said Ghani was too focused this spring on trying to launch peace talks with the Taliban.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The Taliban is intensifying its attacks, and this is the greatest threat that Afghanistan faces, and that is largely because the Afghan government was not prepared for this,” Azamy said. “It was just way too optimistic about a peace process.”

Azamy noted that Ghani and Abdullah still haven’t named a defense minister and attorney general. Thirty of 34 Afghan provinces still lack a permanent district governor or police chief.

“In all these provinces, except a few, you have acting people who are not seriously committed to the job,” Azamy said.

During a meeting with Western journalists one week ago, Ghani acknowledged that Afghanistan will “face a difficult year.”

“But at the end of it, I think we are going to come out much stronger,” the president said.

Ghani appears to be succeeding in getting Pakistani leaders to play a more active role in trying to control the flow of fighters and ammunition across the border.

After a visit to Kabul on Tuesday, Pakistan Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif said Pakistan now considers the Afghan Taliban to be the “enemy,” a surprisingly strong statement, given Pakistan’s past alliance with the group.

Generals from Afghanistan, Pakistan and the United States met Wednesday in Kabul to discuss how they can better coordinate operations.

The Afghan army continues to expand its capabilities, U.S. military officials said.

In late April, as part of a broader effort to go on the offensive in traditional Taliban strongholds in southern Afghanistan, the Afghan army’s 203rd Corps mounted a 22-day slog through the mountains in the Nawa district of Ghazni province.

Afghan troops killed or wounded 250 Taliban fighters, dismantled 700 bombs and seized 35,000 tons of explosives. When the operation ended earlier this month, Afghan forces controlled the district for the first time in at least a decade, said overseeing Gen. Mohammad Sharif Yaftali.

But Mohammad Ali Ahmadi, the deputy governor of Ghazni province, said the Afghan army would have to permanently station 1,000 soldiers in Nawa to keep the Taliban from returning. Some provincial officials doubt the 148,000-member Afghan police force can stand up to the militants.

Yaftali, however, isn’t sure his troops will remain in large numbers.

“Ideally, when it comes to the security of the district . . . the Afghan government should get involved,” Yaftali said when asked about Ghazni’s request. “So, no comment.”

Pope Francis Calls Palestinian Leader Mahmoud Abbas An 'Angel Of Peace' // Huffington Post // Associated Press - May 16, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

VATICAN CITY (AP) -- Pope Francis praised Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas as an "angel of peace" during a meeting Saturday at the Vatican that underscored the Holy See's warm relations with the Palestinians.

Francis made the compliment during the traditional exchange of gifts at the end of an official audience in the Apostolic Palace. He presented Abbas with a medallion and explained that it represented the "angel of peace destroying the bad spirit of war."

Francis said he thought the gift was appropriate since "you are an angel of peace." During his 2014 visit to Israel and the West Bank, Francis called both Abbas and Israeli President Shimon Peres men of peace.

Abbas is in Rome for the canonization Sunday of two 19th-century nuns from what was then Ottoman-ruled Palestine. The new saints, Mariam Bawardy and Marie Alphonsine Ghattas, are the first from the region to be canonized since the early days of Christianity.

Abbas on Saturday offered Francis relics of the two new saints.

Church officials are holding up the new saints as a sign of hope and encouragement for Christians in the Middle East at a time when violent persecution from Islamic extremists has driven many Christians from the region of Christ's birth.

Abbas' visit also comes days after the Vatican finalized a bilateral treaty with the "state of Palestine" that made explicit its recognition of Palestinian statehood.

The Vatican said it had expressed "great satisfaction" over the new treaty during the talks with the Palestinian delegation. It said the pope, and later the Vatican secretary of state, also expressed hopes that direct peace talks with Israel would resume.

"To this end, the wish was reiterated that with the support of the international community, Israelis and Palestinians may take with determination courageous decisions to promote peace," a Vatican statement said.

It added that interreligious dialogue was needed to combat terrorism.

This Hillary-Clinton-in-Brooklyn video brings the Beastie Boys to Sesame Street // WaPo // Philip Bump - May 15, 2015

I have to assume that whoever posted the video from Hillary Clinton's day in New York City on Thursday knew what they were doing when they titled it "Hello Brooklyn." As in, "Hello Brooklyn," the C-side sub-track from the Beastie Boys' "Paul's Boutique" that achieved cult status for its driving bass line and intense intro.

The Clinton video is a bit less energetic.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You'd be forgiven if you were watching it and assumed it was a behind-the-scenes from some time when Clinton appeared on Sesame Street. About halfway through, though, you'd probably think, Where are the puppets?

The video, in the already-familiar, heavily edited-Clinton-being-a-beloved-regular-person genre, manages to pack several New York City tropes into its 57 seconds.

· A stoop in front of a brownstone

· A diverse (though heavily female) group of regular people

· A plumbers' truck

· A cab driver talking in an accent although the accent is not exactly the traditional New York accent and the cab is one of the apple-green "boro" cabs, not a traditional yellow one. (Bad casting, Team Hillary!)

It could certainly have used:

· A bodega

· A game of pick-up basketball

· Some cops or firefighters

· A car driving by, blaring music

· A rat

· A tourist buying a hot dog and biting into it with enthusiasm before experiencing the onset of nausea

· Clinton and her entourage struggling to make their way around a group of people that decided the best place to have their conversation was immediately outside the doorway of the brunch place

· A mustache

· But the real problem here is that the intro promises to answer the question, "How do Brooklyn residents feel about their new neighbor?" By our count, there were about 60 people in the video who were not Clinton staff (look for the Huma Abedin cameo right at the beginning!) or Secret Service. The population of Brooklyn is 2.6 million, meaning that Clinton spoke to 0.002 percent of the borough. This is not an entirely representative sample.

Of course, Brooklyn will vote for Clinton anyway. That's the other thing here: If Clinton can't find 60 people that love her in one of the bluest zones in the United States, there's a bigger problem at play. Try this on the streets of Oklahoma City or Laramie and see how it goes.

And a tip to Clinton's communications team: Clinton should absolutely have walked out of whatever building that was, thrown her head back, and yelled, "Hellllllllllllo Brooklyn!" The Beastie Boys were very popular, and there was a reason why.

Why Barack Obama's popularity matters to Hillary Clinton // WaPo // Philip Bump – May 17

When George H.W. Bush ran for the presidency in 1988, he was running as the second-in-command to a still-popular Ronald Reagan. He beat Democrat Michael Dukakis handily. When his son ran in 2000, he was running against the second-in-command to a still-popular (more popular than Reagan, even) Bill Clinton. But he won.

Which raises the question: Next year, when a third Bush (or some other Republican) looks to succeed a two-term Barack Obama, how much does Obama's popularity matter?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The short answer, as the University of Virginia Center for Politics' Alan Ambramowitz wrote earlier this year, is that, historically, higher approval ratings for the outgoing president have correlated with a higher percentage of the popular vote for the member of his party looking to replace him. We'll note only now that George W. Bush won the presidency in 2000, but not the popular vote.

Ambramowitz figures that each 10 percentage points of approval for a president is worth about 1.8 percent of the popular vote for the candidate from his party. If Obama's at 50 percent approval, the eventual Democratic nominee, whoever she might be, might be expected to earn just more than half of the popular vote. If Obama's at 45 percent, Ambramowitz figures that Democrat is looking at just more than 49 percent of the vote.

What's particularly interesting is how much more strongly the president's approval rating in presidential years correlates to his party's success in those years than his approval in non-presidential years links to results in the House. There are a lot of reasons for this, including that we included the president's reelections in the data below, which naturally has a robust correlation. The difference is still dramatic, though.

Right at the center, where the two 50 percent lines overlap, is the election of 1976.

In other words, just because Obama was at 44 percent approval right before last year's midterms isn't necessarily why his party got clobbered. (It certainly didn't help.) In 1990, George H. W. Bush was much more popular, but Republicans got a lower percentage of the vote than Democratic House candidates did in 2014. (There are a lot of reasons for this, too, including that there were far more Democratic incumbents in 1990.)

A number of other large factors (like the strength of the economy) will weigh for which ever Democrat wins the party's hotly contested nomination. And some small ones will, too, but ... to a smaller extent. How Obama is viewed by this time next year is not a dealbreaker. But if he's at, say, 25 percent approval, the Post's post-Election-Day front page can probably be prepared in advance.

Iowa Democratic Party Leaders Add Their Names to Letter Urging Elizabeth Warren to Run for President in 2016 // Move On // Brian Stewart - May 14, 2015

From: Lily Adams-

IOWA — Eighteen additional Democratic Party leaders from across Iowa have joined with Run Warren Run supporters from around the country in urging Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-MA) to run for President in 2016.

In a letter, re-released on Thursday, 18 Democratic Party leaders join 16 previous signers in counties and cities across the state in a letter citing Sen. Warren's record as a tireless advocate for working families and calling on the issue's biggest champion to join the 2016 presidential contest.

The full letter is below:

Our country is at a crossroads. The rich get richer, but middle-class families and those struggling to make it into the middle class work harder while falling further behind. Income inequality is at its highest since 1928 and wages remain too low. The game is rigged.

If you work hard, if you play by the rules, it doesn't matter where your parents were born, what color your skin is, whether you're a woman or man, or who you love—you should be respected in our society, you should be valued, and you should be able to make ends meet. You should be able to walk down the street without fear. You should be able to live on a sustainable planet. And your voice should count in our democracy. Washington can no longer be run by lobbyists, the powerful, and corporate interests for their own advantage.

As the 2016 presidential campaign begins, it is time for Democrats to be bold, to stand for something, to propose innovative, inspiring solutions to our nation's toughest challenges, and to stand strong for core American values.

We need leaders who aren't afraid to tell the truth, and fight back—no matter what powerful interests say—and we need all the candidates in the caucus to offer a bold vision for an economy that works for all Americans.

Contested caucuses test and strengthen candidates and ensure progressives have a chance to make our voices heard. Having a real debate is what democracy is all about.

That's why Americans from all walks of life have risen up to encourage Senator Elizabeth Warren to run for President. Sen. Warren is a fighter for middle-class and working families who has stood up to the corporate interests and Wall Street banks. I urge Elizabeth Warren to run for President in 2016.

One thing Iowans value is the first-in-the-nation caucus, and a chance for candidates to come into our homes and libraries and community centers to talk to real voters. We look forward to all the candidates coming to Iowa to share their views about the critical issues that matter to us.

"I'm very passionate about saving our democracy from the power of corporate personhood. Particularly, my parents were immigrants and our democracy is about opportunity for all. Subject: Agency Leads John,

We'd like your feedback on two leadership roles in Agency teams.

1) A replacement (if any) for Sam Nunn on DOD. John Hamre was one of the names we'd discussed before in considering a more senior face to put on the DOD team as you desired. Do you want us to ask him or to develop other candidates, or have Bill Lynn and Michele Flournoy stay as co-leads?

2) James Loy cannot serve (conflict of interest) as co-lead of DHS with Randy Beers. Randy has proposed two candidates: John Gannon and John Gordon. While Susan and I would be fine with either, we do not know if either would do it.

John Gannon was to have led the pre-Nov 4 Intel/DHS transition but had a conflict of interest and time that led him to step away from the lead. John Gordon's business interests may similarly impede him from playing a role. We'd like your guidance regarding whether to proceed with seeking a co-lead for Randy and if so whether you have preferences.

An alternative model would be to have Randy lead and appoint a deputy -- perhaps Clark Kent Ervin (african american, former DHS counsel) or Ron Lee from NSA since he'd rather be on DHS. Please let us know your thoughts.

Thanks. -Sarah

New York Times: First Draft: "Hillary Clinton Met With Elizabeth Warren in December"

By Maggie Haberman and Jonathan Martin

February 17, 2015, 10:30 a.m. EST

Hillary Rodham Clinton held a private, one-on-one meeting with Senator Elizabeth Warren in December at Mrs. Clinton's Washington home, a move by the Democrats' leading contender in 2016 to cultivate the increasingly influential senator and leader of the party's economic populist movement.

The two met at Whitehaven, the Clintons' Northwest Washington home, without aides and at Mrs. Clinton's invitation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton solicited policy ideas and suggestions from Ms. Warren, according to a Democrat briefed on the meeting, who called it “cordial and productive.” The former secretary of state, who has been seeking advice from a range of scholars, advocates and officials, did not ask for Mrs. Warren to consider endorsing her likely presidential candidacy.

The conversation occurred at a moment when Ms. Warren’s clout has become increasingly evident. Since last November’s election, Senator Harry Reid, the Democratic leader, appointed the Massachusetts freshman to a leadership role in the Senate; Ms Warren led a high-profile effort to strip a spending bill of rules sought by large banks; and a patchwork of liberal groups began movement to draft her into the presidential race.

Ms. Warren has repeatedly said she is not running for president, and she has taken no steps that would indicate otherwise. Still, she is intent on pushing a robust populist agenda, and her confidantes have suggested that she would use her Senate perch during the 2016 campaign to nudge Mrs. Clinton to embrace her major causes: addressing income inequality and curtailing the power of large financial institutions.

The get-together represented a step toward relationship-building for two women who do not know each other well. And for Mrs. Clinton, it was a signal that she would prefer Ms. Warren’s counsel delivered in person, as a friendly insider, rather than on national television or in opinion articles. And for Ms. Warren, the meeting offered the opportunity to make clear what she believes are the most pressing national issues.

That Mrs. Clinton — who is currently developing her economic platform — reached out to Ms. Warren suggests the former first lady is aware of how much the debate over economic issues has shifted even during the relatively short time she was away from domestic politics while serving as the country’s chief diplomat.

Mrs. Clinton was often criticized by the right as a doctrinaire liberal during her husband’s presidency and, as a presidential candidate, ultimately ran as more of an economic populist than Mr. Obama. But she is now seen by some on the left as insufficiently tough on Wall Street. That perception, denounced by allies as an unfair criticism, has stuck in part because of her husband’s policies, and because of the lucrative speaking fees she has collected from financial firms and private equity groups since she left the State Department in early 2013.

The meeting in December fell two months after a more awkward encounter: Mrs. Clinton and Ms. Warren crossed paths at a Massachusetts rally for the Democratic nominee for governor there last year, Martha Coakley. At that event, Mrs. Clinton repeatedly described Ms. Warren as a champion against special interests and big banks; Ms. Warren, in turn, barely acknowledged Mrs. Clinton, who was the featured guest, in her remarks.

Both Mrs. Clinton and her husband appear anxious to keep a close eye on the former Harvard law professor; the former president in the past has appeared sensitive about Ms. Warren’s oblique criticism of his deregulation of financial institutions. Beyond policy differences, the Clintons are eager to demonstrate that they, like Ms. Warren, appreciate the economic difficulties many Americans are facing.

The December meeting recalled another private session between Mrs. Clinton and a Democratic upstart: In 2005, shortly after he was sworn into the Senate, Barack Obama paid a visit to Mrs. Clinton in her Senate office. In that instance, though, it was Mr. Obama who was seeking counsel.

Politico: “Hillary Clinton trounces Chris Christie in New Jersey poll”

By Adam B. Lerner

February 17, 2015, 9:35 a.m. EST

Chris Christie may be the Garden State’s blunt-talking favorite son, but if a presidential contest were held today in New Jersey between the governor and Democrat Hillary Clinton, she would trounce him, a new poll finds.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The poll, conducted by Rutgers University's Eagleton Institute of Politics, shows Clinton garnering 58 percent of the vote in such a contest, compared to 35 percent for Christie.

Perhaps most surprising is the finding that only 8 percent of Democratic voters in the Garden State would support their Republican governor in a presidential contest. In his 2013 reelection campaign against Democrat Barbara Buono, Christie managed 32 percent of Democratic votes, according to exit polls compiled by The New York Times.

Clinton also holds commanding leads in the Garden State when pitted against former Florida Republican Gov. Jeb Bush — 58 percent to Bush's 32 percent — or Wisconsin's Republican Gov. Scott Walker — whom she bests 60 percent to 29 percent in a hypothetical matchup.

The poll also asked New Jersey voters whether or not the current Democratic front-runner has the "right look," "right demeanor" and "right experience" to occupy the Oval Office. Voters overwhelmingly decided that these three labels do apply to Clinton: Forty-seven percent more voters said she has the "right look" than not, 50 percent more voters agreed she has the "right demeanor" and 68 percent more voters said that she has the "right experience" to be elected president.

The poll, released Tuesday, was conducted among 694 registered New Jersey voters using live callers between Feb. 3 and Feb. 10. The samples were weighted to reflect New Jersey's demographics, with an adjusted margin of error of plus-or-minus 4.1 percentage points.

New York Times blog: The Upshot: "Hillary Clinton and the 2016 Democrats: Mostly Liberal, Together"

By Derek Willis

February 17, 2015

Among seven potential Democratic presidential contenders, Hillary Clinton is the overwhelming favorite — and the third-most liberal candidate. How the other candidates are arrayed on an ideological spectrum could make her run for the White House easier than the last time out.

In some ways, the cast of candidates for 2016 resembles the group from the 2008 race, with a field ofstalwartly liberal politicians. Mrs. Clinton was slightly more liberal in 2008 than now, according to Crowdpac, which scores politicians on a left-right scale of -10 to 10. (Crowdpac bases this mainly on campaign contributions, but also on votes and speeches.) Her problem was that Barack Obama, who was further to the left of her — at -7.8 to her -6.9 — also had the donors who were to the left of her. He ran a better campaign, particularly in Iowa, and benefited from a surge in money from small-dollar donors.

This time, Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts (-8.2) and Bernie Sanders (-8.3), Vermont's independent senator, are to her left. Ms. Warren has the higher fund-raising profile of the two, with a leadership PAC that raised more than $2 million during the 2014 election cycle. But she and Mrs. Clinton (and to a lesser extent Mr. Sanders) would be competing for a similar pool of donors. During her 2012 Senate race, Ms. Warren raised more than $3.4 million from individuals who also gave to Mrs. Clinton's presidential campaign, Federal Election Commission data shows.

The field of potential Democratic presidential candidates is ideologically cohesive. While there is room to the left of Mrs. Clinton's Crowdpac score of -6.4, there is not a lot.

The lack of distance between the Democratic hopefuls suggests that creating a wedge between someone like Ms. Warren and Mrs. Clinton would be harder among Democratic donors, and perhaps among the broader primary electorate.

There are few issues where the gap between those two is significant. Gun control policy and immigration are possible points of contention, according to Crowdpac, which also generates scores for issues. On both issues, Ms. Warren is scored as much more liberal than Mrs. Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The situation is different for Republicans, with considerable space available to the right of Jeb Bush (4.2) — and a lot of candidates to vie for it.

There is more room to the right of Mrs. Clinton. Most of the other potential candidates fit there, including Vice President Joe Biden, who has a -4.4 score, and Jim Webb, the former Virginia senator, who is at -5.3. Those two resemble the more centrist Democratic candidates that won the nomination in previous elections. Al Gore, for instance, had a Crowdpac score of -5.1 in 2000. Bill Clinton rated a -4.45 in 1996.

Mr. Obama is the most liberal Democrat elected to the presidency in the period Crowdpac has analyzed, which began in 1980.

Mr. Obama was able to broaden his pool of donors beyond what earlier Democratic primary candidates managed. Donors likely to support Democratic candidates will include moderates and some conservatives, but as the party has shifted left, its donors have gone with it. Mrs. Clinton benefits from that shift even as she stands quite a distance from her husband on the ideological spectrum.

Time: "The Risk of Rand Paul's Trolling Strategy"

By Tessa Berenson

February 17, 2015, 12:42 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] What happens when you troll in real life?

Trolling has always been a part of presidential politics, but few candidates have taken to it quite as aggressively as Sen. Rand Paul.

In recent months, the Kentucky Republican has used social media to post snarky, provocative comments aimed at his likely opponents in the 2016 Republican presidential primary as well as Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton.

In December, he took to Twitter to repeatedly criticize Florida Sen. Marco Rubio's opposition to opening relations with Cuba in what many observers argued was straight-up trolling. In January, he posted a jokey "secret tape" of Clinton and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush talking about the White House on SoundCloud. And on Valentine's Day, he posted a mock Pinterest page for Clinton that showed her ideas to remodel the White House (including a heart-shaped hot tub and a girly Oval Office).

In many ways, Paul's trolling is the obvious next step in presidential politics. President Obama has already adopted a lighter tone online, starring in BuzzFeed videos, submitting to YouTube stars' goofy questions and capitalizing on memes, while Speaker John Boehner has gone ahead and used Taylor Swift GIFs to troll the White House's plan to make community college free, among other things. It was only a matter of time before a presidential candidate started speaking in the Internet's native language of snark.

Vincent Harris, Paul's chief digital strategist behind the trolling, told Yahoo! News that the edgy tone is necessary to cut through the clutter:

"The strategy and the number one problem that people have in politics is just getting their information across to somebody — how do you reach somebody at all," he said. "News and information has to be entertaining, it's got to be interesting and it's got to be different than how everyone else is communicating."

Already, some Beltway insiders have pushed back against Paul's strategy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I don't think you want to be troller-in-chief," an unnamed Republican digital strategist told Politico. "This might be how they think they separate from the pack, reach out to younger people. … I just think it's pretty close to trolling, which we think is weird for a regular person, much less someone who wants to be leader of the free world."

But the real test will come when the rest of the public takes notice. For now, Paul's trolling is being read by young people who spend all day on the Internet, jaded political professionals and the fairly troll-ish Beltway press corps, so there isn't a real downside to it. But as the general public starts to tune in over the coming months, there's a risk that a snarky tweet meant to get attention will succeed in breaking out of the Internet and into the regular offline world.

Only then will we know whether voters are ready for a troller-in-chief.

National Law Journal: "Hillary Clinton Cleared of Campaign Finance Allegations"

By Zoe Tillman

February 17, 2015, 12:06 p.m. EST

The Federal Election Commission has cleared Hillary Clinton and supporters of her would-be presidential run of allegations of campaign finance violations.

The FEC said in a Feb. 12 letter that the commission "found that there is no reason to believe" that Clinton violated campaign finance laws by not registering as a presidential candidate to date or that the Ready for Hillary political action committee violated laws by failing to register as an authorized committee.

The commission sent the letter to Stop Hillary, a political action committee that filed a complaint with the FEC against Clinton and her supporters more than a year ago. The group sued the agency in Washington federal district court in December, accusing officials of delaying action on its allegations. On Tuesday, Stop Hillary notified the court that it was dropping the case now that the FEC had acted.

An attorney for Stop Hillary, Dan Backer of DB Capitol Strategies in Alexandria, Va., told the NLJ on Tuesday that the group would consider whether to go back to court to challenge the FEC's decision once they reviewed documents from the agency proceedings. Assistant General Counsel William Powers of the FEC said in the Feb. 12 letter that documents related to the case would become part of the public record within 30 days.

"For now we don't know and we don't want to waste the court's time or the FEC's time," Backer said. "We can't know until we review the respondent's communications to the FEC."

A spokeswoman for the FEC declined to comment. A representative of Ready for Hillary was not immediately reached for comment.

Stop Hillary claimed in its FEC complaint that Ready for Hillary used an email list belonging to the authorized campaign committee for Clinton's previous U.S. Senate run, called Friends of Hillary.

"This email was sent or 'deployed' by Hillary Clinton or a vendor employed by the authorized committee to do so," Stop Hillary wrote in the December lawsuit. "Such a deployment would, as is industry standard practice, require approval by the list owner, in this case Hillary Clinton, of the specific content being deployed."

Stop Hillary claimed that Clinton authorized Ready for Hillary to act on her behalf, and that meant Clinton was a presidential candidate who needed to register as such with the FEC. Stop Hillary also said that Ready for Hillary should have registered as an authorized committee and been subject to certain campaign finance regulations.

The commission found that the facts presented by Stop Hillary about the email list "do not suggest that Clinton became a candidate" under federal election law, according to a legal analysis included with Powers' letter. Ready for Hillary told the FEC that it paid Friends of Hillary $136,841 to use the email list and that Friends of Hillary was not involved in the email that Ready for Hillary sent out.

Even if Clinton had authorized Ready for Hillary to act on her behalf, the commission said, "she would not become a candidate as a result of those activities so long as they were related only to testing the waters. And the available record here reflects that Clinton and Ready for Hillary PAC have confined their activities solely to evaluating a potential candidacy."

Powers wrote in the FEC's letter that "there were an insufficient number of votes" to find that Ready for Hillary violated campaign finance laws by failing to report the money it spent on its rental of the email list from Friends for Hillary.

Vox: "Hillary Clinton's uncontested nomination is dangerous for her and her party"

By Matthew Yglesias

February 17, 2015, 8:30 a.m. EST

Hillary Clinton is essentially running unopposed for the Democratic Party nomination in 2016. Yes, Bernie Sanders is in the race. But he has so little support that his natural core constituency is pouring all its time and energy into trying to nudge Elizabeth Warren into the race. But she's not running.

It's a problem. A problem for the Democratic Party, a problem for the United States of America, and ultimately a problem for Hillary Clinton herself.

Not because there's anything wrong with Clinton as a nominee per se. But because there's a lot wrong with a non-existent primary campaign and an untested candidate. Everyone — in many ways including Clinton herself — would be better off if a serious candidate such as Warren, Joe Biden, or someone else managed to enter the race with enough backing and plausibility to force Clinton into a real campaign. That would mean real debates, real media strategy, real policy rollouts, and all the other accompaniments of a presidential nominating congress.

Anything less leaves her dangerously unprepared as she heads into the ultimate contest with a Republican who will have emerged battle-tested from an unusually deep field of plausible contenders.

The un-candidate

The most proximate way in which Clinton's lack of opposition hurts her is in allowing her to maintain her current state of un-candidacy. This means she continues to give high-dollar buckraking speeches with no clear end-date on the calendar. For Clinton personally, this is a balancing act. On the one hand, buckraking has some downsides in terms of public perception. On the other hand, she gets money. For the broader Democratic Party, though, it's all downside. An actual primary campaign would shift Clinton's balance of considerations — focusing the mind on doing what has to be done to win the presidency.

But the bigger problem is simply that running for president is hard.

A vigorous primary campaign is a means through which, among other things, the key potential vulnerabilities in a candidate's biography get aired. Was Clinton lying about her opposition to gay marriage the way David Axelrod says Obama was? Have too many years at the pinnacle of

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

American politics left her out of touch with middle class struggles? Can she distance herself from Obama administration foreign policy initiatives that didn't work out (settlement freeze? Russia reset?) without sounding disloyal or ineffectual? Can she answer questions about the complicated finances underlying her husband's foundation?

As long as she's "not running" we just don't know. And the closer she gets to obtaining the nomination without answering the questions, the more vulnerable the position she leaves herself in for the general election.

Unprecedented dominance

Clinton's problem isn't that these are devastating weaknesses. It's simply that like all candidates she has some weaknesses. And normally one function of the primary campaign is to give everyone an opportunity to make sure that the eventual nominee is someone who is able to parry these questions in a reasonable way. In 2012 both Rick Perry and Tim Pawlenty looked like strong candidates on paper, but their inability to deliver competent debate performances gave party leaders a chance to ditch them rather than deal with an embarrassing meltdown in the middle of a general election campaign.

But Clinton's odds of securing the Democratic nomination are so overwhelming that it seems doubtful she'll be tested in any but the most cursory of ways.

She's not by any means the first overwhelming favorite to win a nomination. But even presidential primary juggernauts like Al Gore and George W. Bush in 2000 faced more-than-token opposition from Bill Bradley and John McCain. The underdogs in both cases had at least some endorsements from elected officials and couldn't be simply ignored. Bradley's challenge, in particular, proved rather easy to brush back. But Gore still had to show up, campaign in key states, mobilize volunteers, and debate the issues. The likes of Jim Webb and Bernie Sanders aren't even remotely in that class.

To be clear, I like Sanders, but the fact that his natural constituency is spending all their time on a doomed effort to get Elizabeth Warren into the race tells you what you need to know. Webb's idea of running on an agenda of making Democrats friendly to white men is, merits aside, a mathematically impossible way of securing the Democratic nomination even if he had endorsements or money (which he doesn't).

This isn't opposition Clinton needs to deal with in any way — not with debates, policy initiatives, or anything else. She'll just ignore them, hit the GOP field, and coast to the nomination without the party ever getting a real chance to kick the tires.

A thin electoral resume

Given the extraordinarily long period of time during which Clinton has been in the public eye, this may not seem so bad. But despite being perhaps the single most-covered person in politics over the past quarter century, her record as an actual candidate for office is a bit thin. She ran about five points behind Al Gore in New York in 2000, vanquished nominal opposition in the Democratic landslide year of 2006, and then botched a 2008 primary campaign in which she held formidable advantages.

There is much more to political than electioneering, and Clinton's considerable political skills shouldn't be discounted.

Her ability to secure the Senate nomination in a state where she'd never lived, her 2008 reconstitution of her husband's political operation, and her dominating position in 2016 are all testament to those skills. But in terms of dealing with the media, speaking extemporaneously, and wooing the voters she's had at best a mixed record of success. When she popped her head up for a quasi-campaign book tour, she immediately fumbled and interview claiming to have been "dead broke" when she left office. At the end of the day, presidential campaign gaffes rarely seem to matter much. But they surely don't help. And one reason they don't matter is that nobody makes it through the nominating process without showing they can take the heat.

In 2016, Clinton isn't going to have to show that. And it might cost her — and her party — dearly down the road.

Subject:	Iran Statement

FYI the below just went out to the press from HRC on Iran:

Statement From Secretary Clinton on Iran

The understanding that the major world powers have reached with Iran is an important step toward a comprehensive agreement that would prevent Iran from getting a nuclear weapon and strengthen the security of the United States, Israel, and the region. President Obama and Secretary Kerry have been persistent and determined in pursuit of this goal, building on a decade of bipartisan pressure and diplomacy. Getting the rest of the way to a final deal by June won't be easy, but it is absolutely crucial. I know well that the devil is always in the details in this kind of negotiation. So I strongly support President Obama and Secretary Kerry's efforts between now and June to reach a final deal that verifiably cuts off all of Iran's paths to a nuclear weapon, imposes an intrusive inspection program with no sites off limits, extends breakout time, and spells out clear and overwhelming consequences for violations. The onus is on Iran and the bar must be set high. It can never be permitted to acquire a nuclear weapon. It is also vital that these efforts be part of a comprehensive strategy to check Iran's regional ambitions, defend our allies and partners, and reinforce American leadership in the Middle East. There is much to do and much more to say in the months ahead, but for now diplomacy deserves a chance to succeed.

Subject: Friday at the Sacramento Airport....

Dear John & Mary,

Friday at the Sacramento Airport, as Patti and I got off the plane, we were stopped by a fellow passenger. "Congressman, I just want to thank you for SB 250, your 1982 law that established the Emergency Medical System for California. It has worked for 33 years. I'm the Deputy Director and we save lives every minute. Thank you for your vision."

Wow! What a wonderful way to complete a week of reflection set in motion by the Pope's visit to Washington and the Congress. Yes, reflecting on my public policy work is satisfying. It's a good journey and I always look to tomorrow's challenges.

The list of issues is long and in every way affects all humanity today and future generations as well. Next week I will engage our European allies in a discussion of nuclear weapons. I'm deeply troubled by the restart of a nuclear arms race involving the United States, Russia, United Kingdom, France and China. America will spend over $1Trillion dollars in the next 25 years rebuilding our nuclear bombs and fielding new stealth bombers, missiles, submarines, satellites, and defensive systems. One trillion dollars of your tax money will not be spent on education, infrastructure, healthcare and so many more important issues here at home and abroad, but rather on creating a far more dangerous world.

In Congress we must debate and act on Climate change, challenging our Republican Colleagues to honor the Pope's message on this threat to future generations. We must seek creative ways to revitalize our economy, preserve environmental resources, and create new opportunities for people to receive an affordable education, and a good middle class job. In Congress, I have worked across the aisle to secure emergency fire and drought funding, to fight for American jobs with my Make it in America bills, and to promote diplomacy and peacebuilding.

In this journey I have not been alone. Patti has always been at my side for every step and every issue, and you are there too with advice, financial support and a good word of encouragement.

Yes, it is a good journey, and part of that journey is the never-ending necessity to raise money for the next election, which is just 10 months away. We are quickly approaching the September 30th quarterly reporting deadline, and my campaign needs your support. If you pitch in $25, $50 or $100 to my campaign, we can continue to address pressing issues facing our nation.

I am passionate about investing in American families to ensure prosperity for generations to come. That is why I will be seeking reelection in 2016. Your support throughout the years has been critical to my success, and I hope I can count on you to stand with me in the coming months. You can help by making a contribution here. Big or small, it all counts, so please click here and send what you can.

Thank you for your support,

Holiday prayers. You can see why many non-Jews who have come to our services in the past have told us how enriching it is for them to be part of this experience even when they, like many of the Jews who come, don't fully understand the Hebrew chants--the music itself carries many to a deep place inside, and there's plenty of English guidance to the prayers as well.

Our special focus this year is on prayers and guided visualizations for saving the life-support system of the planet at a time when the environmental crisis continues to deepen.

We are a Jewish community that prays for the wellbeing of not only Israel but also of Palestine, that supports the nuclear deal with Iran, that seeks to end racism because Black Lives Matter, and that knows that the selfishness and materialism we often encounter in other human beings is an internalization of the larger dynamics of the competitive marketplace that undergirds global capitalism. We also know that changing all this cannot be accomplished without simultaneously changing ourselves and that Judaism has wonderful spiritual practices for both inner and outer transformation.

Washington Post: "Hundreds of big donors, including Obama bundlers, are 'Ready for Hillary'"

By Philip Rucker and Matea Gold

July 31, 2014, 11:46 a.m. EDT

A diverse cadre of big money Democratic players has directed millions of dollars into a super PAC supporting a potential presidential bid by Hillary Rodham Clinton, underscoring the extent to which the party machinery is tilting in her favor.

At least 222 donors have signed up as co-chairs of Ready for Hillary's national finance council — a commitment that requires donating or raising $25,000 each, or at least $5.6 million between them, according to a membership list obtained by The Washington Post. More than 600 other donors are considered members of the finance council, required to give or raise $5,000 each.

The Ready for Hillary fundraising team includes scores of President Obama's biggest campaign bundlers — evidence that the rift between the two camps has healed considerably since 2008. The super PAC also features donors representing all major sectors of the Democratic Party's money base, from Hollywood to Silicon Valley to Wall Street, the list shows.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The former secretary of state, who is months way from announcing a decision about a 2016 campaign, enjoys a massive head start in assembling a finance network compared with any other candidate, Democratic or Republican. The breadth and depth of support for her campaign-in-waiting could give serious pause to any Democrat weighing a primary challenge, such as Vice President Biden or Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley.

"If you look at the finance council as a whole, it's very representative of what a potential Hillary Clinton campaign's finance council will look like," said Adam Parkhomenko, co-founder and executive director of Ready for Hillary. "You have people who've been supporting her for 10, 20, 30 years; you've got people who've never made a contribution to any political campaign before; and you have people who were really active in 2008 and 2012 for President Obama's campaigns."

Shortly after November's midterms elections, Ready for Hillary plans to hold a national finance council meeting in New York to discuss the super PAC's future and Clinton's potential campaign, officials said. While Ready for Hillary can't coordinate with a campaign, it could probably rent or exchange its lists of supporters and donors, campaign finance experts say.

The group has positioned itself as the repository of grass-roots support for Clinton, with many backers giving symbolic gifts of $20.16. But its membership list shows it is being bolstered substantially by big donors. Of the $8.2 million the super PAC reported raising through the end of June, $1.1 million came from donors who gave less than $200, according to a Post analysis of Federal Election Commission reports.

The super PAC's finance council includes Hollywood players (legendary sitcom producer Marcy Carsey and "Homeland" and "24" producer Howard Gordon), technology entrepreneurs (Salesforce.com chief executive Marc Benioff and Enscient Corp. founder Shelly Kapoor Collins), gay rights activists (Tim Gill and Jon Stryker), trial lawyers (Dallas lawyer Marc Stanley), Wall Street financiers (former Goldman Sachs partner Daniel Neidich) and billionaire heavyweights (hedge fund guru George Soros and philanthropist Eli Broad).

Ready for Hillary's leaders have made concerted efforts to woo key backers of Obama's campaigns to make the case that Democrats who were bitterly divided in 2008 will unite behind Clinton. The invitation for a $1,000-per-ticket reception at an upscale Chicago steakhouse in June was co-hosted by longtime Clinton friend Kevin O'Keefe, who ran her Illinois effort in 2008, as well as high-profile Obama bundlers Alan Solow and Laura Ricketts.

"We were careful to show a unified group, so many people important to her and Obama were all together," said Kevin Conlon, a public affairs executive who helped organize the reception.

Fifty major fundraisers who served on Obama's 769-member national finance committee in 2012 already have signed on as co-chairs or members of Ready for Hillary's finance council, according to the Post analysis.

Among them are Benioff, Gill, Qualcomm co-founder Irwin Jacobs, New Jersey public relations executive Michael Kempner, technology investor Steve Spinner and former California state controller Steve Westly.

The corps of former Obama backers also includes Ursula Terrasi, who runs a home store in Kansas City. She said she was drawn to Obama as a candidate — meeting him during the 2008 campaign, she said, "was the most exciting thing." But now she is lining up behind Clinton, whom she said she has "admired from afar."

"I feel it's time for a woman president," said Terrasi, who as a Ready for Hillary co-chair hosted a Kansas City fundraiser that drew some 250 people.

The coalescing of deep-pocketed donors around Ready for Hillary is particularly remarkable given the existence of a different super PAC, Priorities USA Action, that Hollywood producer Jeffrey Katzenberg and other Clinton backers have deemed as the preferred vehicle for big money. After some initial tension between the two groups, Ready for Hillary agreed to voluntarily cap its donations at $25,000.

Priorities USA, meanwhile, has held off fundraising efforts in order not to siphon funds away from the super PACs working to back congressional Democrats in the midterms. So far this cycle, it has collected less than $6,000 in individual contributions, while giving $250,000 each to the Senate and House super PACs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the midterms haven't slowed down Ready for Hillary. The group has made donations to several state parties and, once Clinton hits the campaign trail this fall, will assist candidates she endorses.

"We'll echo her," Parkhomenko said. "We're going to take that energy and excitement around a potential Hillary Clinton candidacy and put that into action around 2014."

While the vast majority of the super PAC's 90,000 donors have given small sums, more than half of Ready for Hillary's money — nearly $4.8 million through the end of June — came from 1,018 contributors who each gave the organization more than $500, officials said.

Many Ready for Hillary co-chairs hail from outside the world of Clinton loyalists. They include New York art dealer Larry Gagosian, who gave money to support Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney in 2012, and Northern California philanthropists John and Marcia Goldman, major Democratic benefactors who have given thousands to the party's congressional super PACs.

Other co-chairs are relatively new to big-money politics: Sharon Elghanayan Corzine, who is married to former New Jersey governor Jon Corzine, had only written a few large checks in the past before giving Ready for Hillary $25,000 at the end of March.

But the Ready for Hillary leadership also includes plenty of Hillaryland stalwarts: Esprit clothing line founder Susie Tompkins Buell, former congresswoman Ellen Tauscher, Democratic National Committee official Carol Pensky, Washington philanthropist Edie Fraser and former State Department adviser Shelly Porges.

"It is like a groundswell," Pensky said. "Once she actually announces, I do think it's going to be incredible to see the support that is going to come her way."

Fraser said that she and other Clinton friends make a point not to talk about their fundraising efforts with Clinton for fear of getting into murky legal waters. Federal election laws prevent candidates from directly coordinating with super PACs.

"There's basically an arm's-length reach," Fraser said. "I don't think any of us talk to her about Ready for Hillary."

The super PAC also provides a way for longtime Clinton fundraisers — as well as newcomers — to get in early on what they see as her all-but-certain 2016 campaign.

Dan Kessler was only 18 when Clinton ran for president the first time. Now, at age 24, he is a Ready for Hillary finance council co-chair and organized a fundraiser at a Philadelphia nightclub that drew 400 young professionals. Kessler said he has helped put together similar events in Boston, Chicago, New York, Pittsburgh and Seattle.

Kessler said he first met the Clintons as a child; his father, Alan, is a prominent Democratic fundraiser who has backed Bill or Hillary Clinton's campaigns since the 1980s. He said he feels "a real driving predicate of galvanizing this youth involvement across the country."

"Nothing's certain," Kessler said, "but if and when she decides to run, I feel that the networks that I've built across the country are going to be tremendous."

[Subtitle:] It's been years since Democrats held a national security advantage in a presidential race. If Clinton runs, the GOP will be scrambling to take it away.

For evidence that foreign affairs are swiftly emerging as a central factor in the nascent 2016 presidential race, look no further than Dallas, deep in the heart of Texas and 7,000 miles away from the brutal conflict in Gaza.

There, on Wednesday, Texas Gov. Rick Perry gave a speech reaffirming his solidarity with the people of Israel. While it might feel a little like the mayor of Sacramento standing up to Vladimir Putin, the move said much about the wide-open Republican field.

With the world aflame in Gaza, Ukraine, Syria, and elsewhere, potential 2016 candidates are sharpening their foreign policy and national security credentials, seeking outside counsel, and raising their profiles. Perry is just one example. In recent months, others such as Sens. Ted Cruz, Rand Paul, and Marco Rubio have been proving the adage that politicians should never let a crisis go to waste.

The Obama administration has given them a target in plain sight. And while it's relatively easy to lob brickbats from the cheap seats, saying that the president should be, in effect, doing more everywhere, there's another reason why possible contenders have to be working on their foreign policy game now, not later: the prospect of a Hillary Clinton candidacy.

Clinton, the former secretary of State, could place Democrats in an unfamiliar position in the next presidential race, giving them the edge in foreign policy and national security. You would have to go back to Al Gore's race against George W. Bush in 2000 to find the last time that happened—and Gore was never the nation's leading diplomat.

"It's assumed she is a heavyweight on foreign policy," said Vin Weber, the former Republican congressman from Minnesota and a member of the Council on Foreign Relations. "You can't look like you're completely outclassed."

Conversely, should Clinton not run and Democrats embrace someone such as Elizabeth Warren, who seems almost exclusively focused on domestic economic issues, that edge would vanish and some Republican—be it Perry, Rubio, or someone else—will be in a position to capitalize. That means they have to lay the groundwork now.

Clinton presents a formidable challenge. She is widely viewed, rightly or wrongly, as more hawkish than Obama, more willing to use American military power. And she has been subtly distancing herself from the president's approach toward hotbeds like Syria and Russia. Her comments in a weekend interview on CNN were seen by some as a critique of the administration. The United States, Clinton said, needs to "go back out and sell ourselves" on the world stage. "What do we stand for and how do we intend to lead and manage?" she asked, adding, "I don't think we've done a very good job of that."

It essentially means that Clinton would, should she run, be occupying the space that might normally be held by a traditional national security Republican, someone like John McCain or Mitt Romney. The New York Times even wondered aloud whether Clinton could be considered a neoconservative in the mold of, wait for it, Paul Wolfowitz. That doesn't mean Clinton would be firewalled from Republican attacks. As Weber says, she can't entirely separate herself from Obama. For one thing, she'll have to defend her move at State to "reset" relations with Putin and Russia—although now she says she was "skeptical" of Putin all along.

In terms of outreach to the foreign policy establishment, Clinton, too, is light-years ahead of her potential rivals. At the State Department, she formed a bipartisan outside advisory group, which included neoconservative scholar Robert Kagan; John Negroponte, who served as an adviser to President Reagan and national intelligence director under George W. Bush; Stephen Krasner, a former aide to Condoleezza Rice at State; and Stephen Hadley, who served as Bush's national security adviser.

Clinton's centrist street cred could force some contenders to veer more sharply to the right to define themselves. There are signs that's already happening. In an interview this week with the Daily Beast, Cruz said he would consider scuttling any nuclear-arms deal struck by the Obama administration with Iran if he considered it a threat to national security. Last month, Rubio likened Sunni insurgents in Iraq and Syria to al-Qaida and criticized Obama for publicly ruling out sending U.S. ground troops to the region. And then there's very real political risk that conservatives such as Cruz could end up alienating mainstream voters with a relentless focus on foreign policy side issues, namely Benghazi.

But no one's carved out a niche like Paul, who has found himself under repeated attack by the GOP national security establishment. Perry led the charge with a withering op-ed in The Washington Post earlier this month, in which he said the Kentucky libertarian wants to create a "giant moat" around America "where superpowers can retire from the world."

Paul's camp denies the senator's foreign policy should be viewed as "isolationist," as Perry charges. Lorne Craner, a foreign policy adviser to Paul, told National Journal that Paul should be considered a "realist" along the lines of former Republican foreign policy titans like James A. Baker III, Casper Weinberger, and George Schultz. "He has a very high bar for military intervention," said Craner, who worked at the State Department under Colin Powell. "That is important. I think we've learned last 10 years—the last 40 years really—to think carefully before you get into a war."

Ostensibly referring to Perry and some other of Paul's critics, Craner added: "Republicans used to have a reputation as the foreign-policy grownups. That's not the way most voters would describe it at this point."

Paul's recruitment of Craner is part of his extended outreach to Washington's foreign policy community. He's also met with Elliott Abrams, the former Middle East policy expert in the Bush administration, among others. While praising Paul's intellect, Abrams said, "I think he wants to see a very diminished American role.... I think his view is quite distinct."

For his part, Cruz tapped Victoria Coates, a former aide to Donald Rumsfeld, as his top national security adviser after she did a turn advising Perry during the 2012 campaign. Rubio brought aboard Jamie Fly, a member of the National Security Council during the Bush administration and the former executive director of the Foreign Policy Initiative, a neoconservative advocacy group, as his national security adviser. According to The Post, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie has consulted with Richard Haass, the president of the Council of Foreign Relations.

Christie illustrates the hazard of trying to master foreign relations on the fly. In March, he had to apologize to GOP mega-donor Sheldon Adelson after referring in a speech to Palestinian regions in Israel as "occupied territories." Weber says that while foreign policy is rarely the primary concern of voters, a "gaffe can be fatal. Every presidential candidate has to make sure they look knowledgeable on America's role in the world."

It's a concern that no doubt was in the forefront of Perry's mind as he delivered his remarks on Israel on Wednesday from the relative safety of Dallas. Like many of his potential rivals, the governor is learning to swim in water that's getting deeper by the day.

CNN: "Applying for new job? Clinton tinkers with her bio"

By Dan Merica

July 31, 2014, 11:47 a.m. EDT

Just like anyone thinking about applying for a new position, Hillary Clinton – or people close to her – have tinkered with and beefed up the promotional biography she uses at different events.

Since leaving the State Department in 2013, Clinton's speaking agency provided organizations before which she was appearing with a variation of the lengthy bio that she uses at the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation. The organization would, in turn, use some or all of the bio in promotional and press materials.

"The bio we used came directly from the Harry Walker agency," said an organizer of a past Clinton event who didn't want to be identified. "It was verbatim and they insist on that as part of the agreement. It is in her contract."

But recently, Clinton has dispensed with her old bio and gone with a shorter description that emphasizes her new memoir and work as secretary of state, including specific highlights from her four years as America's top diplomat.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A Clinton spokesman tells CNN that the bio was updated for Clinton's new memoir and subsequent book tour. The bio now, however, reads much like the same pitch Clinton has given for why her four years at State were a success and why she would possibly succeed as president.

Clinton undertook efforts "to restore America's leadership after eight years in which it was badly eroded," states the bio, an apparent swipe at former President George W. Bush.

During her nearly two month book tour around her memoir "Hard Choices," Clinton has been asked repeatedly what her major accomplishments were at State. In an answer that now mimics her bio, Clinton told NPR in June that "the most important thing I did was to help restore America's leadership around the world. ... We were flat on our back when I walked in there the first time."

These efforts, according to the bio, included "repairing our fraying alliances to negotiating a cease-fire in Gaza that defended Israel's security and headed off another war in the Middle East," "mobilizing an international coalition to impose crippling sanctions against Iran" and "standing up to China and helping reassert the United States as a Pacific power."

"Thanks in large measure to Hillary's leadership, people were finally able to say: America's back," reads the bio. "She championed human rights, internet freedom, religious freedom, and rights and opportunities for women and girls, LGBT people, and young people around the world, as she has her entire career."

The bio also emphasizes economic actions Clinton took, stating that the former secretary of state "went to bat for American workers and companies around the world to boost exports, create jobs back home, and level the playing field against unfair competition from China and elsewhere."

This is a noticeable departure from Clinton's old bio, which highlighted Clinton's lengthy history in public life, including eight years as first lady of the United States and eight years as the United States senator from New York.

While the old bio mentions Clinton's time as secretary of state – "In her four years as Secretary of State, Clinton played a central role in restoring America's standing in the world and strengthening its global leadership," states to bio – it lacks the specificity that the new bio includes.

Examples of Clinton's new bio began to crop up around events the former secretary of state will attend this fall.

For four upcoming events – an August 28 tech keynote in San Francisco, a September 15 medical keynote in Washington, DC, an October 8 medical keynote in Chicago and a December 4 women's event keynote in Boston – Clinton used the new bio.

In most of her previous speeches – for example, her March speech at the University of California Los Angeles, her April speech at the University of Connecticut and her February speech at the University of Miami – Clinton used a version of her older bio.

Business Insider: "Clintons Dismiss Tell-All Books About Them As 'Complete Crap'"

By Colin Campbell

July 31, 2014

Team Clinton has taken their public criticism of tell-all books about President Bill Clinton and Hillary Clinton to a new level, accusing a trio of authors of "concocting trashy nonsense" and producing "complete crap" about them, according to a new Politico report published Thursday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Their behavior should neither be allowed nor enabled, and legitimate media outlets who know with every fiber of their being that this is complete crap should know not to get down in the gutter with them and spread their lies," spokesmen for Bill, Hillary, and their daughter, Chelsea Clinton, reportedly said in a joint statement.

The three books — "Blood Feud" by Ed Klein, "Clinton, Inc." by Daniel Halper, and "The First Family Detail" by Ronald Kessler — contain several salacious anecdotes regarding the former first family. In July, the New York Post quoted allegations from Kessler's upcoming book that Bill Clinton "has a buxom blond mistress who visits so often when Hillary Clinton isn't home in Chappaqua that the former president's Secret Service detail have given her an unofficial code name: Energizer." One Klein anecdote depicts Hillary Clinton, an expected presidential contender in 2016, criticizing President Barack Obama by saying, "You can't trust the motherfker."

The Clintons are not alone in viewing some of the books' accounts as highly suspect. Klein has come under particular scrutiny from critics who have all but accused him of fabricating his quotes. Previously, a source close to Hillary Clinton told Business Insider Klein was one of the most "despicable" people in the world. (Klein responded: "In typical Clinton fashion, when people can't handle or respond to the truth, they attack the messenger.")

The Clintons' statement to Politco lumped all three authors together as "despicable actors."

"With Klein, Halper and Kessler, we now have a Hat Trick of despicable actors concocting trashy nonsense for a quick buck, at the expense of anything even remotely resembling the truth," the statement said. "It's an insult to readers [and] authors, and should be reserved for the fiction bin, if not the trash."

Roll Call blog: Five by Five: "New Benghazi Report Reaches 'Noncontroversial Conclusions,' Congressman Says"

By Tim Starks

July 31, 2014, 9:57 a.m. EDT

Rep. Adam B. Schiff, D-Calif., said Thursday that a House Intelligence Committee investigative report on Benghazi that the panel voted to approve reaches "noncontroversial conclusions" and that it should be declassified swiftly. Schiff serves on the Intelligence panel as well as the new Republican-created select committee investigating the 2012 attack on the U.S. diplomatic facility in Libya.

His full statement:

"The Intelligence Committee report adds to the body of investigative work now completed by numerous committees in Congress, and reaches the same noncontroversial conclusions – that the initial talking points provided by the intelligence community were flawed because of conflicting assessments not an intention to deceive, that there was no stand down order, that the diplomatic facilities lacked adequate security, and that our personnel at the scene acted bravely and appropriately.

"This bipartisan report should be declassified quickly, so that the American people may know what we have learned behind closed doors, and how it concurs with other analysis already made public."

The select Benghazi panel, meanwhile, has been interviewing victims' families. Chairman Trey Gowdy, R-S.C., recently announced that it would hold its first hearing in September, and that former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and former Central Intelligence Agency Director David Petreaus need to testify.

The Hill blog: Briefing Room: "Obama, Clinton could collide on Vineyard"

By Rebecca Shabad

July 31, 2014, 10:58 a.m. EDT

President Obama and Hillary Clinton will both be on Martha's Vineyard next month at the same time, The Boston Globe reports.

Clinton is scheduled to sign copies of her memoir Hard Choices at the Bunch of Grapes Bookstore in Vineyard Haven on Aug. 13. She's considered the 2016 Democratic frontrunner for president if she decides to enter the race.

The trip by Clinton overlaps with Obama's Aug. 9-23 vacation at Martha's Vineyard.

The bookstore appears to only be a 25-minute drive away from Chilmark, Mass., which is where the Obamas will be staying, according to Martha's Vineyard Times.

It's unclear, however, if the two will meet up.

The president and his family have vacationed on the Vineyard every year since he took office except 2012 because of his reelection campaign, the report noted.

This year, locals told the Times that the Obamas will be staying in a seven-bedroom, nine-bathroom house worth an estimated $12 million that overlooks the Vineyard Sound.

Joanne Hubschman owns the home, which features 17 rooms in total, a hot tub, infinity pool, and a tennis-basketball court. Hubschman's late husband was a former executive at General Electric.

The Obamas vacationed last December in Hawaii, which is where the president grew up.

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "How Hillary Clinton has become more popular than Barack Obama"

By Sebastian Payne and Sean Sullivan

July 31, 2014, 12:17 p.m. EDT

"You're likable enough, Hillary."

How times have changed since then-Sen. Barack Obama made that remark in a televised debate ahead of the 2008 New Hampshire primaries. Back then, more of the public preferred Obama over rival Sen. Hillary Clinton. In a poll conducted soon after Obama gave that backhanded compliment, 54 percent said they had a favorable opinion of Clinton compared to 63 percent for Obama. The Democrats, and eventually the nation, decided that Obama was the more popular one, as demonstrated by his later primary successes and two presidential election victories.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But six years later, the popularity ratings of Obama vs. Clinton have reversed. According to a new Quinnipiac University survey of Ohio voters released Thursday, things are pretty bad for President Obama in the Buckeye State. He has a 36 percent approval/59 percent disapproval rating. Things are better for Clinton — she leads a handful of potential 2016 presidential opponents, including popular home state Gov. John Kasich (R).

"The bad news for Democrats is that President Obama's approval rating in Ohio is close to his all-time, all-state low. The good news for the party is that the president doesn't appear to be hurting the Democrats' consensus front-runner for 2016, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton," said Quinnipiac pollster Peter Brown in the polling memo.

Ohio, a perennial swing state, is fertile ground for Clinton ahead of a possible 2016 run for president. She sports a +9 net favorable rating. And she beats four potential GOP foes in head-to-head match-ups, according to the poll: Clinton tops Kasich 47 percent to 40 percent; she gets past Sen. Rand Paul (Ky.) 46 percent to 42 percent; she bests former Florida governor Jeb Bush 48 percent to 37 percent; and she tops New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie 46 percent to 37 percent.

Other polls reinforce the Quinnipiac findings. At the beginning of 2014, 49 percent said in a Post-ABC poll they held a favorable opinion of Obama, but 58 percent said the same for Clinton. Although Clinton's favorable ratings have fallen by nine points since Clinton resigned as secretary of state, her new popularity suggests she has weathered the scrutiny and strains of high political office better than the president has.

Clinton is now seen by the public as the stronger leader. A CNN/ORC poll carried out this month offered a direct comparison of the characteristics of both politicians, and in every category, Clinton beats Obama. By double-digit leads, Clinton is seen by more people as a decisive leader and able to manage government effectively. More people also believe Clinton "generally agrees with you on issues you care about," cares about "people like you," as well as "sharing your values." Although it's not a direct comparison, the same poll puts Clinton on a 59 percent job approval rating from her time as secretary of state. Obama has a 41 percent approval rating.

Some of the groups who have felt alienated by the Obama presidency are being won round by Clinton. Take Wall Street, always one of the president's most complicated relationships. Although Wall Street financiers raised over $12 million during Obama's last campaign, few financiers appear to have much love for the president. It was his administration that pushed the Dodd-Frank banking reforms into law, and Obama said recently that "further reforms" are required. As one banker put it to CNN Money: "There's been so much finger pointing. He's made it seem bad to be successful and to be millionaires and billionaires."

But Clinton has cultivated a warmer relationship with Wall Street. Last week, she spoke at the Ameriprise Financial Conference in Boston — adding to her frequent visits to Goldman Sachs and to investors such as those from The Carlyle Groups. Going back to 1999, Clinton backed the repeal of the Glass-Steagall banking law, which some, including potential 2016 candidate Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), believe played a part in the financial crisis. Clinton's popularity on Wall Street may help her against Republicans if the GOP chooses an openly critical candidate in 2016, such as Sens. Rand Paul (Ky.) or Ted Cruz (Tex.). But Jeb Bush might pose more of a threat; a top Republican lawyer recently told Politico that he would "love" a Clinton vs. Bush race in 2016, as "either outcome would be fine."

On foreign policy, look for Clinton to contrast her more hawkish tendencies with the Obama administration's approach. During an interview on CNN on Sunday, Clinton appeared to criticize the Obama administration's interactions with other nations. "How do we try to enlist the rest of the world in this struggle between cooperation and order and conflict and disorder, which is really at the root of so much that's going on today? And I don't think we've done a very good job of that," she said. She also noted the popularity of George W. Bush in Africa because of his efforts to battle AIDS there. He made me "proud to be an American again," Clinton said.

Clinton's message was clear when she was secretary of state — "the United States is back." She was keener to intervene in Libya, favored keeping troops on the ground in Iraq and infamously voted for invading Iraq in 2002, before trying to distance herself from that vote during the 2008 presidential primaries.

Obama has sought to end wars and bring troops home. Last month, the president said that U.S. troops could not solve Iraq's problems and that it's up to Iraqis to work out a solution.

While Obama has taken flak for what some call his administration's use of 'soft power,' Clinton has skillfully managed to separate herself from the president, despite once being a key part of his team and directing U.S. foreign policy.

ABC and NBC both had brief segments on Rick Perry entering the race today; Perry is citing his military experience and record as Governor of Texas. On CBS John Dickerson was interviewed and noted HRC was the titan of the race; Dickerson said Chafee was interesting because he challenged HRC's trustworthiness and foreign policy judgment, while MOM argues that America needs a new generation. Dickerson said the danger for HRC was that voters would hear a consistent message from Republicans and Democrats for a long time.

Hillary Clinton Says G.O.P. Rivals Try to Stop Young and Minority Voters // NYT // Amy Chozick – June 4, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton on Thursday accused Republicans including her potential rivals Jeb Bush, Scott Walker and Rick Perry of "deliberately trying to stop" young people and minorities — both vital Democratic constituencies — from exercising their right to vote, as she presented an ambitious agenda to make it easier for those groups and other Americans to participate in elections.

Speaking at Texas Southern University here in front of her largest crowd yet as a candidate for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, Mrs. Clinton accused Republicans generally of enacting state voting laws based on what she called "a phantom epidemic of election fraud" because they are "scared of letting citizens have their say."

"What is happening is a sweeping effort to disempower and disenfranchise people of color, poor people and young people from one end of our country to the other," Mrs. Clinton told a crowd of about 2,000 in a basketball arena at the historically black campus.

She called for automatic voter registration in every state when young people turn 18, criticized Republican-sponsored voting laws in North Carolina, Texas and Wisconsin, and urged Congress to take immediate action to reinstate an important provision of the Voting Rights Act that she said the Supreme Court had "eviscerated" in a 2013 ruling.

In addition to areas she said needed to be addressed, like easier online registration, shorter lines at polling precincts and a minimum of 20 days for early voting before an election, Mrs. Clinton called for a nationwide law modeled on one recently passed in Oregon that automatically adds voters to the rolls when they turn 18, using driver's license data. Residents would have to opt out to avoid being added to the voter rolls.

But she also used the occasion to attack by name several of her potential Republican rivals.

"There are people who offer themselves to be leaders whose actions have undercut this fundamental American principle," Mrs. Clinton said.

Mr. Perry, the former Texas governor who formally entered the race for the Republican nomination on Thursday, "signed a law that a federal court said was actually written with the purpose of discriminating against minority voters," she said, and he "applauded" when the Voting Rights Act was "gutted."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"But Governor Perry is hardly alone in his crusade against voting rights," Mrs. Clinton continued. In Wisconsin, Governor Walker "cut back early voting and signed legislation that would make it harder for college students to vote," she said. Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey "vetoed legislation to extend early voting." And when Jeb Bush was governor of Florida, she recalled, "state authorities conducted a deeply flawed purge of voters before the presidential election in 2000" that sent his brother George W. Bush to the White House.

"What part of democracy are they afraid of?" she said.

Orlando Watson, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee, called Mrs. Clinton's remarks "misleading and divisive" and "shameless," and said they "ignore the fact her Democrat-led home state of New York does not allow early voting while dozens of Republican-led states do."

Mrs. Clinton's early and aggressive stance on voting rights could help bolster her liberal credentials and energize black voters. In her appearance at Texas Southern University, where blues music and a high school marching band played before she arrived, she invoked the civil rights leaders who worked on the 1965 Voting Rights Act, in a speech that had the feel of an impassioned pitch to the young and minority voters who largely supported Mr. Obama over Mrs. Clinton in 2008, and whom she will need to win in 2016.

Mrs. Clinton recalled helping register poor and Hispanic voters in Texas for George S. McGovern's presidential campaign in 1972. And she praised Barbara Jordan, the congresswoman and civil rights leader for whom an award Mrs. Clinton accepted on Thursday was named.

Texas is a solidly red state, but by delivering her remarks here, Mrs. Clinton could communicate to voters in battleground states without seeming too overtly political, her supporters said.

"Ohio will hear it. Pennsylvania will hear it," said Representative Sheila Jackson Lee, a Texas Democrat who presented Mrs. Clinton with the inaugural Barbara Jordan Gold Medallion.

"The rhetoric is great," said Representative James E. Clyburn, a South Carolina Democrat and the highest-ranking African-American in Congress. "But that's all you can do when you're not in office, is talk," he cautioned. "It takes getting elected to get something done."

Mr. Clyburn, who clashed with Bill Clinton on racial issues during the 2008 Democratic primary, said of Mrs. Clinton's remarks, "I'd hope people would respond with their voting, sufficiently enough for her to win the office and follow through."

Mrs. Clinton spoke not just of minority voters, but also of young people who she said had been disenfranchised by new voting laws in states like Texas.

"If you want to vote in this state, you can use a concealed weapon permit as a valid form of identification, but a valid student ID isn't good enough," Mrs. Clinton said.

Hillary Clinton calls for sweeping expansion of voter registration // WaPo // Anne Gearan & Niraj Chokshi – June 4, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton on Thursday called for sweeping changes in national voter registration laws aimed at making it easier for young people and minorities to take part in elections, putting her on a collision course with Republicans who say such reforms are a political ploy that would lead to widespread abuses.

In a speech at a historically black college here, Clinton called for federal legislation that would automatically register Americans to vote at age 18 and would mandate at least 20 days of early voting ahead of election days in all states.

Clinton believes that universal registration would help "expand access to the ballot box," particularly for young people, the elderly and minorities, an aide said ahead of Clinton's speech at Texas Southern University.

Nationwide mandatory voter registration would help Democrats, whose support frequently comes from younger, poorer and minority groups that may also be less likely to sign up to vote at 18 on their own. The change would have to be approved by Congress — now controlled by Republicans — so it is unlikely to happen in time to benefit Clinton in the 2016 election if she is the Democratic nominee.

Clinton said Republican state legislatures are deliberately restricting voting by curtailing early access to the polls and other measures in an effort to suppress Democratic turnout.

Several GOP presidential hopefuls, including Rick Perry in Texas and Scott Walker in Wisconsin, pushed such restrictions as governors. Clinton spoke on the same day that Perry announced his own second White House run near Dallas.

Republican efforts to limit voter registration have a disproportionate impact on low-income communities and on young voters, Clinton said.

Under universal voter registration, every citizen would be automatically registered to vote on their 18th birthday, unless they actively opt out.

About 71 percent of eligible adults nationwide are registered to vote, according to Census figures, and a lower percentage actually show up at the polls. Registration and turnout tend to be higher among older and relatively affluent white voters, who are also more likely to vote Republican.

Although early voting has become fairly common in the last decade, it remains a cause of suspicion for many Republicans who say it increases the opportunity for fraudulent voting. Republicans have raised similar objections to same-day registration and other efforts — many of them led by Democrats — to make voting easier or more convenient.

Election analysts generally agree that voter fraud is rare, although there have been a handful of well-publicized examples of fraudulent names being added to the rolls.

Clinton's address comes as Democrats are pursuing legal challenges to voting rule changes approved by Republican legislatures in several states. The candidate and her allies claim the changes are aimed at narrowing the electorate in ways that benefit Republicans.

"This is, I think, a moment when we should be expanding the franchise," Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta said in an interview Wednesday. "What we see in state after state is this effort by conservatives to restrict the right to vote."

In recent weeks, top Clinton campaign lawyer Marc Elias has co-filed lawsuits over voting access in Ohio and Wisconsin, both key presidential battleground states with Republican governors who may join the 2016 race.

"This lawsuit concerns the most fundamental of rights guaranteed citizens in our representative democracy — the right to vote," lawyers wrote in a federal complaint filed Friday in Wisconsin.

"That right has been under attack in Wisconsin since Republicans gained control of the governor's office and both houses of the State legislature in the 2010 election," the lawsuit alleges.

Since the 2010 Republican wave, 21 states have implemented new laws restricting voting access, some cutting back on early voting hours and others limiting the number of documents considered valid identification to vote, according to a new analysis from the Brennan Center for Justice, a nonpartisan think tank at the New York University School of Law. For 14 of those states, the 2016 contest will be the first presidential election with the new restrictions in place.

Some limits also flowed from the 2013 Supreme Court decision that invalidated some parts of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. The day that decision came down, Perry praised it as a "clear victory for federalism and the states" and vowed to proceed with the implementation of a strict photo ID requirement, previously blocked under the law. That requirement is currently being challenged in court, with a resolution expected as soon as this summer.

About three dozen states and D.C. offer early voting of some kind, allowing voters to cast ballots before Election Day without an excuse. The average early voting period is roughly 22 days, the bipartisan National Conference of State Legislatures reported earlier this year. Oregon's breakthrough "new motor voter" law passed earlier this year is the closest any state has come to the kind of automatic registration Clinton called for. Under the new law, all Oregonians applying for a new or updated driver's license are automatically added to the voter rolls, unless they opt-out.

Hillary leans hard into the battle over voting // WaPo // Greg Sargent – June 4, 2015

As you may have heard, Hillary Clinton is already leaning into the ever-simmering battle over voting. Her Democratic allies are preparing to wage a national legal battle against GOP state-level voting restrictions, and she is calling for a national 20-day early voting period.

But now, Clinton is rolling out a third prong in her push for an expansion of voting access: In a speech in Texas that is underway right now, she is calling for universal, automatic voter registration.

Automatic voter registration for citizens has long been championed by voting reformers as a key part of modernizing our voting system. Clinton's proposal would require the registration of all citizens in every state when they turn 18 years of age, unless they opt out. She is also endorsing the general goal of universal registration for those over 18, without endorsing a specific mechanism to accomplish this. According to the Brennan Center, there are various ways to add people to the voter rolls, such as when changes of address are filed. States can also implement required universal registration for people of all ages, as Oregon has done. Clinton cited Oregon as an example today.

Voting reform advocates favor universal, automatic registration as a way to streamline and simplify the registration process, to eliminate matching problems between state databases, reduce the possibility of voter registration fraud, and maximize voter participation.

In political terms, Clinton's call for universal voting registration appears to be a bid to energize millennial voters. As it is, the broader voting access push — like her recent moves leftward on immigration, climate change, and sentencing reform — is partly about mobilizing core Obama coalition groups, including minorities. Today's proposal is more heavily focused on the young. After all, one of the key unknowns of the cycle is whether Clinton will be able to turn out Obama voters on the same levels he did, and young voters — who were excited by the historical nature of Obama's candidacy — are key to that.

"There's a good policy reason why Clinton might support universal voting, but there's also a good political reason," Rick Hasen, a voting law expert, tells me. "These are issues that motivate the Democratic base. Talking about Republicans suppressing the vote gets Democrats excited, just like talking about voter fraud motivates Republicans."

Indeed, Clinton's proposal today seems likely to draw opposition from conservatives and Republicans. For one thing, they would probably seize on the chance to attack her for favoring another government mandate and federal encroachment on states, and also to argue that government mandated registration could produce other types of fraud. The Clinton camp will probably try to pitch this proposal — and her push for more voting access in general — in a way that rebuffs GOP efforts to turn independents against it, casting it as key to maintaining the integrity of the process.

For another thing, as Hasen has noted elsewhere, the battle over voting access revolves around a much deeper dispute, in which some opponents of increased access have explicitly argued that making voting harder actually leads not only to less voter fraud but to more informed choices.

"There are two ways of thinking about voting," Hasen tells me. "The first, which is associated with conservatives, is that voting is about choosing the best candidate. If you take that view, you might want restrictions that winnow out uninterested or uneducated voters. Democrats and liberals are more likely to take the second view — that we should all have an easy way to vote and share in political power."

That seems like an argument the Clinton campaign might want to have.

Clinton names and shames Republicans for voting restrictions // Politico // Annie Karni – June 4, 2015

For the first time since hitting the campaign trail two months ago, Hillary Clinton took on her Republican rivals by name, calling out four presidential contenders as she spoke authoritatively about restoring voting rights and asked rhetorically, "What part of Democracy are they afraid of?"

The former secretary of state also called for a new national standard of at least 20 days of early in-person voting in every state, a move she argued would reduce long lines at the polls and expand participation.

"What is happening is a sweeping effort to disempower and disenfranchise people of color, poor people and young people from one end of our country to another," Clinton said in a fiery 30-minute speech at Texas Southern University, a historically black college.

But it was the portion of her speech where she uncharacteristically went on a personal attack against former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie that was the apex of her speech. About two-thirds of the way into her remarks, she blasted the group for "fear-mongering" on a "phantom epidemic of election fraud."

"Former Governor Rick Perry signed a law that a federal court said was actually written with the purpose of discriminating against minority voters," she said. "He applauded when the Voting Rights Act was gutted." She slammed Texas for having laws where student IDs are not accepted as valid identification at the polls but a concealed weapons permit is.

"In Wisconsin, Scott Walker cut back early voting and signed legislation that would make it harder for college students to vote," she said, and called out Christie for vetoing legislation to extend early voting.

"In Florida, when Jeb Bush was governor, state authorities conducted a deeply flawed purge of voters before the 2000 presidential election," she said. "Today Republicans are systematically and deliberately trying to stop millions of American citizens from voting."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Of her four targets, only Perry is a declared candidate so far.

Clinton challenged the entire group to "explain why they're so scared of citizens having their say."

Arguing for a change of law to allow voting on the weekends, she said: "If families coming out of church on Sunday are inspired to vote, they should be free to do just that. We know that early, in-person voting will reduce those long lines and give citizens the chance to participate."

Clinton said the fight to protect voting rights was "for the student who has to wait hours for his or her right to vote, for the grandmother who's turned away from the polls because her driver's license expired, for the father whose done his time and paid his debt to society but still hasn't gotten his rights back."
The event at Texas Southern University, during which Clinton accepted an award named after Barbara Jordan, the first African-American woman to represent Texas in Congress was her only public event during her Texas trip, sandwiched by fundraisers.
Clinton has been building up her attacks on her likely Republican opponents. In South Carolina earlier this month, she drew a contrast with remarks on equal pay by Walker, and Sens. Marco Rubio of Florida and Rand Paul of Kentucky. But she did not mention them by name.

At a roundtable discussion on immigration reform in Las Vegas last month, she challenged Republicans to attack her by moving beyond President Barack Obama on the issue, and told the participants, "this is where I differ from everyone on the Republican side."

While her campaign maintains Clinton is squarely focused on the primary, Clinton on Thursday showed that the personal attacks are not a one-way street as she embraced an issue that is a flash point between Democrats and the GOP.

Democrats, and particularly minority groups, are energized and angered by what they see as blatant Republican attempts to disenfranchise them. Obama has claimed that the very right to vote is threatened. Democrats have hit the issue hard, not only on the merits but also because it galvanizes the party's base and helps raise money.
On the GOP side, leaders argue restrictive voting laws they support are necessary to maintain ballot box integrity. But many of those laws disproportionately impact minority communities.

Outside groups supporting Clinton see the overall contrast with the Republican party as a strong play for the former secretary of state. As senator, they note, Clinton introduced the Count Every Vote Act, which would have made Election Day a national holiday and put in place early voting, same-day registration and uniform standards for IDs across the states.

"Nearly the entire Republican Party has worked to restrict voting, from Republicans like Scott Walker and Marco Rubio who supported limiting opportunities for early and weekend voting, to Rick Perry who signed legislation that disenfranchised up to 600,000 registered Texas voters," said Adrienne Watson, spokeswoman for the pro-Clinton group Correct the Record. "Hillary Clinton her entire life has championed the right of Americans to have a voice at the ballot box."

Why a Presidential Campaign Is the Ultimate Start-Up // NYT // Neil Irwin – June 4, 2015

A new start-up in Brooklyn Heights has 80,000 square feet of freshly leased office space, computer boxes used as improvised furniture and enormous ambitions.

Its growth plans put Silicon Valley start-ups to shame. The new outfit expects to hire hundreds of people and raise and spend one or two billion dollars by late next year. Its competition is stiff, with similarly well-funded rivals in Florida, Wisconsin and elsewhere.

But if the Brooklyn team succeeds, it will make history. It is a political campaign, not a fledgling tech company, and it aims to get Hillary Rodham Clinton elected president of the United States.

Like the presidential campaigns of a host of other candidates, announced and unannounced, it faces a complex management challenge that parallels those of fast-moving tech start-ups, according to people who have worked in both. Those commonalities contain lessons about how to build a company — or, for that matter, get someone elected president.

Campaigns are "The Fastest Start-ups in the World," as Matt McDonald, a former McKinsey consultant who worked on the 2008 John McCain effort and other Republican campaigns, calls them in a new report issued by Hamilton Place Strategies, the Washington public affairs firm where he is a partner. He points out that buzzy social media firms may attain multibillion-dollar paper valuations quickly, but take years to reach a scale equivalent to a major presidential campaign in spending and employee count.

A serious candidate for president, after all, requires a high-functioning team that is built from scratch in just a few months. That typically means appointing a campaign manager who may have a background as a political strategist but who becomes de facto chief executive of a complicated enterprise that has no time to evolve gradually. Start-ups and campaigns are both driven by people with a range of motives: an idealistic desire to change the world along with less noble goals of attaining a great fortune or power.

An enormous staff must be assembled, learn how to work together and execute intricate and interrelated tasks. Among them are raising vast sums of money and developing and executing what is essentially an enormous marketing campaign. In the end, of course, participants hope to persuade millions of people to "buy" — meaning, show up at the polls and vote for the candidate on Election Day.

"A lot of start-ups and a lot of campaigns are similar," said David Plouffe, the manager of Barack Obama's 2008 campaign who is now chief adviser at the fast-growing transportation upstart Uber. "Decisions need to be made, and there are new challenges every day, while at the same time you're trying to hire a lot of people and scale an organization."

Ken Mehlman, who headed George W. Bush's 2004 re-election campaign and is now an executive at Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, the private equity firm, sees similar challenges. "I viewed my job as being the C.E.O. of a company that in the beginning was a start-up, and was ultimately a very large company," he said. "My underlying thesis is that my job wasn't to be a political genius. My job was to take best management practices and apply them to politics."

Those Obama and Bush campaigns were, almost by definition, the most successful of the last 15 years. One propelled a man with barely two years of experience in the Senate to a two-term presidency, and the other re-elected an incumbent whose popularity was starting to be weighed down by a war. Their lessons are already being emulated by the 2016 presidential campaigns, and could as easily be borrowed by aspiring Mark Zuckerbergs.

The 2008 Obama campaign, for example, put a premium on hiring people for whom the job was a bit of a stretch. All else being equal, for example, it preferred to appoint as director for a given state someone who had been a deputy director in a previous campaign, not someone who had served in the same role many times.

Part of this was necessity; when the Obama effort began in 2007, Hillary Clinton's campaign for the Democratic nomination had locked up many experienced operatives. But in the view of Mr. Plouffe and his colleagues, their approach had advantages because it created a team that had something to prove and was unlikely to be complacent.

"If you assemble a bunch of grizzled veterans, you're not going to get that sense of inventiveness, and the culture will be one that is not terribly conducive to good ideas emanating from everywhere," said Mr. Plouffe. "It happens more naturally in the tech world, where the C.E.O. can come out of anywhere and brilliant people may not have a lengthy résumé."

A related strategy was to create relatively rigid pay bands and avoid getting into lengthy negotiations over salary, the approach being more "this is what this job pays; take it or leave it."

It meant that many people working on the campaign did so for less money than they could have made elsewhere. This helped to create a culture of frugality and made it more likely that people joined the staff because they believed in the campaign, not just for a paycheck.

George W. Bush's campaigns were known for frugality, and Hillary Clinton's nascent 2016 campaign reportedly strives for it (among the manifestations of the thrift: no business cards, and employees are to use their cellphones rather than a desk line).

Mr. Mehlman said that in the 2004 Bush campaign, this culture came from the top: His own salary was $150,000 a year, and no one made more than that. Travel arrangements were made on the cheap, the logic being that every dollar spent on a high-end hotel was one fewer available for advertising or voter outreach in swing states.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I stayed in Motel 6’s just like everyone else,” he said.
The parallel for start-ups is striking. While there are exceptions, young companies typically want to keep expenses down to minimize the rate at which they burn cash, and they want people drawn by belief in the company, not by the allure of a cushy office, generous expense account or high salary.
There are important differences, of course. For people working for campaigns, the potential reward tends to be a job at the White House or a top government agency, while for start-up employees it is a giant payday from stock options.
But campaigns and start-ups share common challenges as they ramp up operations. A campaign that wins its party’s nomination must expand exponentially as it moves from primaries to a general election. What was once a small, tight-knit group must suddenly add many more people, often those with more experience.
It is much like a start-up that goes from a dozen people in a garage to hundreds of staff members, many with deeper résumés than the original ragtag crew. Part of the job for those at the top is massaging egos and trying to keep everyone committed and enthusiastic even as that transition takes place.
“You need to layer in some more senior hands who have been through it before, but deciding who is in decision meetings and who is in charge can be difficult as you scale from a primary campaign to the general,” Mr. McDonald said. “It’s not dissimilar to the old stereotypical Silicon Valley start-up where a company raises venture capital money and gets the company to a certain level, and the V.C.s say, ‘Thanks very much, now we’ll hire a real C.E.O.’ ”
Some of the management questions are fundamental. Should power be concentrated at the top of an organization or distributed broadly? Should there be strict lines of authority in which everyone stays in his or her narrow lane, or a more open management structure where people cut across organizational barriers?
Veterans of both worlds argued that a hybrid approach makes the most sense. They stressed the importance of the leaders setting clear goals and giving subordinates leeway to reach them — combined with accountability should they fail.
Both the Bush and Obama campaigns emphasized measuring success and failure quantitatively. Even for seemingly subjective areas like communications, the Bush campaign would calibrate how many potential voters in a swing state were likely to have seen a news broadcast of a positive story. In other words, a nice press clip was great, but it counted as a success only if it was seen by large numbers of voters in Ohio and Florida.
“Great campaigns are formulaic in the way they establish responsibilities for campaign staff, but also ruthless in their tracking and demands for results,” said Tucker Bounds, a veteran Republican campaign operative who later worked at Facebook, which has a similar culture of high expectations and reliance on data.
